This is a curious book, which professes to describe the manners and customs of people dwelling upon another planet. In the preface, the editor of the book states that the account is derived not from the imagination, but from actual knowledge, and is not written as a satire upon the follies of mankind. He adds, that many years passed away, and many tests were applied, before all doubts as to the reliability of the information received were removed from his own mind, but that if he attempted to explain how the facts reached him, the incredulity of the reader would be increased, because similar experiences would be outside the pale of his own knowledge.

Accepting the statement of the anonymous editor, that he believes the contents of the book to be drawn from actual knowledge, the probability is that the narrative was given through the mediumship of a private individual. It is not impossible that spirits from another planet may sometimes communicate, with more or less precision through a medium; it is also not impossible that scenes upon another world may be observed through the agency of clairvoyance, though many long years must pass away before all the sources of error incidental to the obtaining of knowledge by these methods can be understood and eliminated. The statements made in the book are like those which might be received through a partially developed trance or writing medium. In such cases the messages are often very much unconsciously coloured by the thoughts of the medium, especially when the medium is one who never becomes insensible while the communications are being given.

The professed author of the book narrates how he became the chief ruler of Montalluyah, and at once began to reform the evils existing in society throughout his empire; but the circumstance is palpable that the evils he had to remove were precisely those which afflict English society at the present day. There is less difference at the outset between the dwellers in London and the dwellers in Montalluyah, than there is between an Englishman and a Chinaman. Thus, the description of the original condition of Montalluyah would appear to have been conceived in an English brain, or to have had to pass through the brain of an English person before it was written. When it is remembered that the differences in the force of gravity and the amount of temperature would cause such very great physical differences in all kinds of organic life upon another planet, as compared with organic life upon the earth, when, also, the variations in the length of day and night are considered, it becomes the more evident that many of the thoughts in the book are of mundane origin. A vague idea pervades the popular English mind, that electricity has extraordinary powers. If a table rises in the air, or anything inexplicable takes place, Mrs. Grundy often satisfies her own mind with the remark, "It's all electricity!" In the book now under notice, there are said to be many different kinds of electricity which are applied upon another planet to a great variety of useful purposes, yet no practical information is given in the book how to separate the alleged different kinds of electricities, or how to apply them to the useful purposes mentioned, so that the communication stops just where it might begin to be valuable. The editor of the book, it is but fair to state, is conscious of the shortcomings just mentioned. He says, speaking of himself in the third person:—

"If the fragments had been less fragmentary, and fuller information had been offered on the various subjects which fall under consideration, he would have been better satisfied. Nevertheless, he reflects that it would be hardly reasonable to expect, in facts made known under exceptional circumstances, the fulness of detail which we have a right to demand, when on our own planet we essay to make discoveries at the cost only of labour and research. He looks upon the fragments as 'intellectual aerolites, which have dropped here, uninfluenced by the will of man; as varied pieces detached from the mass of facts which constitute the possessions of another planet, and rather as thrown by nature into rugged heaps than as having been symmetrically arranged by the hand of an artist."

In all mediumship, the individuality of the medium and the individuality of the communicating spirit seem to be blended; sometimes the one preponderates and sometimes the other. The best mediums are easily and frequently entranced. The less developed mediums are seldom or never entranced; and the messages through these are usually very considerably unconsciously coloured by their own thoughts and modes of expression. If the contents of the book before us were given through mediumship, there would appear to be more of the individuality of the medium than of the spirit in the messages received, and whether the spirit attempting to communicate belonged to the earth or another planet, we think there is no evidence in the book to show. All communications of this kind should, however, be printed, with full particulars about the method by which they were given, and a description of the development of the mediumship, so that the matter published may be of use to the rising body of students of mental science.

The book is an entertaining one, and contains suggestions of a valuable character relating to education and to social reforms. To the general reader it will be of as much interest as the late Lord Lytton's book, The Coming Race, it being a work of somewhat the same style.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

When, in 1865, Mdlle. di Muraka came out at Her Majesty's Theatre in the opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, she created an impression not easily forgotten. The first thing to strike every amateur was her originality. Both vocally and histrionically her performance differed from that of any Lucia with whom the public had been familiar. In appearance and demeanour there was something weird about her, and this peculiarity was found to tell powerfully in certain situations where the fate-struck Lowland maiden is put well nigh to her wit's end. Conspicuous among these situations were the duet with Enrico, when a glance at the forged letter, exposing the infidelity of Edgardo, drives Lucia to despair; the signing of the contract, her acknowledgment of which calls down the malediction of her first incredulous, then utterly confounded, lover; and last, and most impressive, the scene of the madness. What struck everybody at that time can hardly fail to strike everybody now. Mdlle. di Muraka looks, acts, and sings the part almost precisely as she looked, acted, and sang it eight years ago. She shows genuine feeling in the duet with her brother, and deep-felt emotion in the scene of the contract—almost crouching at the feet of Edgardo, while that offended lover, in stentorian tones and with demonstrative gestures, delivers the well-known malediction. But, as always, the scene of the madness is the culminating point. In this absorbing situation, which the poet has so well imagined and the musician so powerfully expressed, Mdlle. di Muraka won rapt attention from the beginning, and retained it to the end. The extensive range of her voice enables her to master the bravura passages with ease, and to add no little of her own with equally safe assurance. It is not, however, particular parts of this scene which invite criticism, but the whole as conceived and executed. Thus regarded, it is in its way unique. That Mdlle. di Muraka was called back and unanimously applauded may well be understood. Success could not have been more fairly earned.

The Edgardo of the evening was Signor Mongini, who in the duet of Act 1, and the "Malediction," gave play to the vigour and enthusiasm for which he has so long been noted, both qualities helping to a fitting climax in the soliloquy of the death-scene ("Fra pooo," &c.), upon which the curtain falls. Signor Mendioroz is an excellent representative of the important character of Enrico, which he not merely sings well, but acts with real dramatic intelligence. Signor Campobello, who has a bass voice of good quality, is a more than capable Raimondo, as was proved by his delivery of the air, with chorus, at the beginning of the third act. The subordinate characters of Arturo, Normano, and Alisa, were set down for Signor Rinaldini, Signor Casaboni, and Mdlle. Bauermeister. The orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, were all that could be wished; and the fine concerted piece (quintet and chorus), which is the prominent feature of the most striking and ingeniously constructed of Donizetti's many finales, was admirably given, and, as usual, encored.

On Saturday the opera was the Semiramide of Rossini, who in the first act is for the greater part as instinctively Babylonian as in almost all the rest he is unconsciously and unmistakably Italian. Nothing remains to be said about this the last opera written by the prolific and genial composer for the country of his birth; nor, taking into consideration who on Saturday night were the representatives of the leading parts, are many words required about the performance—among the finest, by the way, that has been listened to for years. The Semiramide was Mdlle. Tietjens, facile princeps in the highest branch of lyric tragedy; the Arsace was Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini—who, as contralto in the same line, has now few competitors; and the Assur was Signor Agnesi, who acts the character of that mysterious personage, and sings the music which Rossini has put into his mouth so well that one might almost fancy him an Italian successor to the Italian

Tamburini. Even the tenor part of Idreno is competently filled by Signor Rinaldini; while Signor Campobello does his best for the music of the priest, Oroe, and Signor Casaboni his best for that of the Ghost of Ninus—in both instances the result being satisfactory. All the familiar pieces which have for so very many years been accustomed to court applause, and, when adequately delivered, to obtain it, were successful on the occasion under notice. The garden air (with chorus), "Bel raggio lusinghier," when Semiramide exults over the return of Arsace, was given by Mdlle. Tietjens in her most brilliant manner; while the two airs of Arsace, "Ah quel giorno" (Act 1), and "In si barbara sciagura" (Act 2), sung as they were by Madame Trebelli, made their never-failing impression. The four great duets—"Bella imago," for Arsace and Assur; "Serbami ognor," for Semiramide and Arsace; the almost interminable duet at the opening of Act 2, when Semiramide and Assur, confederates in the murder of Ninus, mutually reproach each other; and that scarcely less interminable, though much more beautiful, one, "Ebbene a te ferisci," in which Arsace reveals to Semiramide the fact that he is her son and the son of the poisoned Ninus, containing one of the most tuneful and expressive morceaux d'ensemble ever composed by Rossini ("Giorno d'orrore")—were listened to one after another with the old attention and delight. And no wonder, for they could hardly have been better rendered. Semiramide is an opera in the well-going of which Sir Michael Costa has always displayed the utmost interest. From the overture (unanimously asked for again) to the end, the orchestra has a prominent part to play; while the introductory music in the Temple of Belus, and the elaborate finale to Act 1, when the avenging spectre of Ninus appears, to the accompaniment of music which Mozart himself might have written, claim the chorus as an auxiliary no less important than the orchestra. Nothing more impressive than the acting of Mdlle. Tietjens in this scene could be imagined; the orchestra and chorus were almost all that could be desired; and a nearer approach to a perfect rendering of this, one of the finest concerted pieces of Rossini, can hardly be imagined.

The operas given during the present week have been Lucrezia Borgia (Monday); Rigoletto, with a new Rigoletto, a new Maddalena, and a new Gilda in Signor Del Puente, Mdlle. Justine Macvitz, and Mdlle. Ostava Torriani (Tuesday); and Semiramide (Thursday). For to-night we are promised (as a novelty) the Trovatore. More about the new comers in our next number.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Though Mdlle. Emma Albani is singing now, and Madame Adelina Patti is expected not long hence, the reappearance of the Hungarian, Mdlle. Smeroschi, so favourably received in July, 1872, was by no means an unwelcome event. Mdlle. Smeroschi made her début last year as Adina; this time she came forward with the still more important character of Rosina. One who could pourtray the heroine of L'Elisir d'Amore with such liveliness, and execute the music with such ready fluency, was not likely to fail in her delineation of Rossini's most vivacious heroine. Nor did Mdlle. Smeroschi in any way disappoint expectation; on the contrary, she even surpassed it, and her second assumption may be pronounced fairly equal, if not superior, to her first. Both her personal appearance and natural gifts fit her well for the two characters in which she has hitherto appeared among us. There is something undoubtedly in common between Rosina and Adina, although the former does not, like Donizetti's coquettish village heroine, first torment her devoted lover and then, at the most critical moment, appeal to him with gushing sentiment. The music given to Adina, moreover, is occasionally much after the style of that given to Rosina, admitting, as all must admit, that the superiority of the latter cannot for a moment be called in question. Taken as a whole, the Rosina of Mdlle. Smeroschi, while occasionally a little over-demonstrative, is a performance of more than average merit, and exhibits real dramatic perception. The music lies well for her voice,—a light mezzo-soprano, with the soprano quality in its upper range. She sang the famous soliloquy, "Una voce," extremely well, giving point to the emphatic sentences of the opening movement, and not a little significant meaning to certain parts of the cabaletta. The duet with Figaro, "Dunque io son, la fortunata," was also full of life and character, though here and there surcharged with ornamental flourishes, not Rossini's, and by no means so good as Rossini's own text; but, as all her predecessors have taken, and as all her contemporaries, high and low, persist in taking similar liberties with the greatest master of florid vocal writing that ever lived, Mdlle. Smeroschi can hardly be blamed for assuming that she also is entitled to "embellish," and shine at the expense of the original. Besides, what she does in this way she does with perfect facility. In the "Lesson Scene" she introduced "Rode's air with variations," which has been sadly hackneyed, and seems to be losing the charm that once belonged to it. Still, it is more in keeping with the situation than some things to which of late years we have been habituated by eminent artists.

The part of Almaviva was taken by Signor Montanaro, another of Mr. Gye's most recent importations. Signor Montanaro is master of the secret, now so rare, of executing Rossini's florid passages with invariable ease and fluency. This he showed, in spite of apparent nervousness, in the opening serenade, "Ecco ridente il cielo," with its sequel; and still more convincingly in "A che d'amore," the concluding movement of the duet with Figaro—"All' idea di qual metallo." His recitatives, too, were delivered in the style of one well acquainted with the legitimate Italian school, and his phrasing was for the most part blameless; but there are other qualifications necessary to an ideal embodiment of the gallant and adventurous Count, and these qualifications Signor Montanaro cannot be said to possess. In fact, an ideal Almaviva is almost as seldom met with as an ideal Don Giovanni. Further details would be superfluous. About the Figaro of Signor Cotogni, the Bartolo of Signor Ciampi, and the Basilio of Signor Tagliafico, there is nothing new to say; enough that each in its way presented the well-known characteristics, and was as effective as on any previous occasion. The subordinate parts of Bertha and Fiorello fell, as usual, to Mdlle. Corsi and Signor Fallar. The performance generally, under the direction of Signor Vianesi, was very good; the overture was played with great vigour and precision; while the masterly, spirited, and elaborately constructed finale to the first act, so far as orchestra and chorus were concerned, offered few points for criticism.

On Saturday night last, Mdlle. Albani again appeared in Lucia di Lammermoor, and with the same marked success as on the Tuesday previous. The house was the fullest of the season.

The news of the death, after a very brief illness, of Mr. Augustus Harris, for five-and-twenty years acting manager at the Royal Italian Opera, and in all important affairs Mr. Gye's chief representative and confidential agent, was spread about the theatre early in the course of last Saturday's performance, and was heard with very general regret. Mr. Harris died in the afternoon of the same day from congestion of the lungs. His place will be difficult to fill up, for in his peculiar way he was unrivalled.

The operas performed during the present week have been—Un Ballo in Maschera, with Madame Saar as Amelia, Signor Pavani as the Duke, and M. Maurel—another stranger—as Renato (Monday evening); La Sonnambula, with Mdlle. Albani as Amina, and Signor Nicolini as Elvino (Tuesday); and L'Africaine (Thursday). Rigoletto, with Mdlle. Albani as Gilda, is announced for this evening. M. Maurel is a "hit." More next week.

NEWS FOR MESSRS. GYE AND MAPLESON.

The musical system of at least one "Star World"—according to Peruses, editor of that singular book, "Another World"—is very different from our own. In "Another World" "Do," "Re," "Mi," "Fa" are superseded by an alphabet of sounds through which definite ideas are expressed. In the happy country in question, a single harp, the effects being increased and varied by electricity, is said to combine in its tones the delicacy, expression, and oneness of a single executant with the brilliancy and power of a combined body of performers. If our musical instrument makers could adopt the plan here—what a boon for the lessees of our Opera Houses! To them the "electric harp" would sound most musical, though the reverse of melancholy, for the Saturday night orchestral payments would be confined to one instead of 80 recipients.

[What would the orchestral players on string, and wood, and brass, and percussion, say to this?—D. P.]

THE BENEFIT OF MDME. PAREPA-ROSA AT CAIRO.

Since the opening of the Theatre here, there has never been a more splendid, gorgeous, or festive evening. We already announced, in No. 37 of this paper, the pieces sung by the celebrated artist; returning to the subject, we now give additional particulars. Mdme. Parepa-Rosa sang the 2nd act of the Borgia; Gounod's cavatina, "Plus grand dans ton Obscurité," from La Reine de Saba; the scena and prayer, by the celebrated poet, Berneldaka; the second act of Flotow's opera, Marta; "The last Rose of Summer;" and Arditi's "Estasi." A number of Greek, American, and English gentlemen got up a subscription for illuminating all the theatre with wax tapers, and expended more than 1,600 francs in flowers, magnificent ribbons, and verses in five different languages, which came from all parts of the house, while the electric light shone brilliantly upon Mdme. Parepa-Rosa. Each box was adorned with two nosegays, and sonnets printed in various colours. The theatre was filled to overflowing with the first society in Cairo. Moreover, as Medini was ill, the baritone, Cottone, undertook the part of the Duke, in Lucrezia Borgia, to oblige Mdme. Parepa-Rosa. The latter was attired splendidly, and radiant with the brilliancy of the house. On her appearance, the public broke out in vociferous applause. She and her companions, Corsi and Cottone, vied with each other in rendering this act one of the best portions of the evening's performance.

In consequence, also, of Medini's illness, Madame Parepa had to learn and sing, in twenty-four hours, a Greek song, in which she excited great enthusiasm, and which she had to repeat amid loud cries of bis. When the song was over, she was presented with two lyres, ornamented with French flowers, ivy and laurel. In one were two magnificent gold ear-rings with pendants in the Egyptian style, and in the other a gorgeous and most valuable gold necklace, in the same Egyptian style, three inches broad, and of massive gold. This present came from the association which had taken the benefit under its care. When the lady then sang, in the purest French, Gounod's air from La Reine de Saba, and "The last Rose of Summer," in her native English, it is impossible to describe the effect produced on the representatives of the different nations that inhabit Cairo. The enthusiasm became delirium, for everyone is invariably deeply moved at hearing his own language in a foreign land. From the Princes and Princesses Madame Parepa-Rosa received a bracelet set with diamonds; a medallion with a large brilliant in the centre, and others round it; another medallion ornamented with brilliants and turquoises; an enamelled watch, set with brilliants and pearls, with chain and case; a pair of very heavy Arab bracelets; a brilliant ring, and other objects which it would take too long to mention.—L'Omnibus.

The evening of the 25th March will be for ever indelibly fixed in the annals of Italian Opera at Cairo. On that evening took place the benefit of Mdme. Euphrosyne Parepa-Rosa. I will not attempt to describe all the ovations offered her by an audience as numerous as select. The theatre was crowded; there was not a place vacant even in the gallery. The boxes were contested for by eager applicants, and if the building had been three times as large, it would have been crammed to the ceiling. The selection of the entertainment is a fresh proof of the eminent artist's good taste. It comprised the second act of Lucrezia Borgia; the second act of Marta; the cavatina from Gounod's Reine de Saba; a Greek romance written expressly for the fair and famous vocalist; Arditi's celebrated waltz, "L'estasi;" and an overture with full band by Signor Bottesini. In the act from Marta, the famous song, "The last Rose of Summer," was given by Madame Parepa-Rosa in English so successfully that it had to be repeated; the Greek romance and Arditi's waltz were also encored. On this occasion, the lady indulged in a series of splendid toilettes, each more magnificent and elegant than the rest. The flowers offered her were so numerous that the stage appeared transformed into a garden. There were innumerable bouquets and garlands with elegant ribbons, and all kinds of poetical compositions in Italian, French, and English. To all this must be added the valuable presents sent by the viceregal Princesses, that is to say: a magnificent bracelet in brilliants; a baeloque, also in brilliants, and no less gorgeous; a watch with chain and brilliants; and a very valuable ring of the same kind. Nor were these the only presents received by the lady. It is the custom here with many to send money as well as other precious objects. Thus the Viceroy himself and many others forwarded, as the price of their boxes, several thousand francs! To sum up in a few words: both as far as regards public interest and private feeling, the benefit could not have gone off better, and all hopes of the fair and popular artist must have been amply fulfilled.

The season is now at an end. This evening, Mdme. Parepa-Rosa will say farewell to the Egyptian public, the opera being Don Giovanni, in which she will sustain the very difficult part of Donna Anna. A succession of unforseen and unpreventible circumstances has retarded the production of this opera, though the grand rehearsal took place a fortnight ago. Had not Mdme. Parepa-Rosa been concerned in the matter, the management would have given up all idea of having Mozart's great work performed, as the public will not be able to enjoy it more than a single evening. But the fame of Mdme. Parepa-Rosa as Donna Anna is so great, that the management has decided on giving the opera in spite of everything.—REG. (Correspondent of Il Trovatore).

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

In order to afford the visitors at the approaching grand Exhibition some idea of the musical capabilities of this capital, two concerts will be given on the 4th and 11th of May, by the Society of the Friends of Music, the Vienna Männergesangverein, the Philharmonic Society, and the Singverein combined. The first concert will be devoted to the most celebrated compositions of Schubert, and the second to one or more of the greatest works by Beethoven.

The managing committee of the Society of the Friends of Music have made Madame Gomperz-Bettelheim a significant present, for her rendering of the music allotted to David in Handel's Saul. It consists of a flattering letter of thanks and an admirably executed copy, in Carrara marble, of Michael Angelo's statue of him who overthrew Goliah. On the pedestal is a lyre, the device of the Society, and the words: "the 28th February, 1873," being the date of the performance in which the lady took part.

The right of presenting the opera entitled La Coupe du Roi de Thule, composed by Dias, and first produced at the Grand Opera, Paris, has been purchased for a very large sum by the management of the Imperial Operahouse here. The work will be produced during the period of the great Exhibition.

Miss Minnie Hauck took her leave of the Imperial Operahouse as Angélique, in Le Domino Noir, preparatory to entering upon her engagement at the Comic Opera. It was a great evening for her. The public overwhelmed her with applause, and called her on repeatedly. Nor were her comrades less friendly and demonstrative. On entering her dressing-room, she found it festively decked out; and, at the conclusion of the opera, the members of the company assembled on the stage, and Herr Walter, after making a spirited speech, handed Miss Minnie, in his own name and that of his colleagues, a splendid wreath. On the ribbon which tied it were the names of the donors. The only person who took no part in the proceedings was Mdlle. Ehnn, who expressly forbade her name appearing in connection with any ovation or mark of respect to her Transatlantic sister in art. Previously to appearing at the Komische Oper, Miss Hauck will fulfil a short engagement in Riga.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH IN MONTALLUYAH.

(From "Another World.")

The electric telegraph among us is, in its rapidity, not unlike that used in your world, but is different in construction and mode of working. What is written at one station is reproduced in its exact size and form at another. Even a portrait designed at one end of the telegraph with the electric acid would be instantaneously reproduced at the other end, perhaps many hundred miles distant.

GAIETY THEATRE.

Wallace's ever-popular Maritana—the Bohemian Girl of its composer—was given on Saturday afternoon, as one of the series of English operas promised in Mr. Hollingshead's recently-issued prospectus of the summer season. It is far too late in the day to discuss either Mr. Fitzball's drama, or the music allied to it by Wallace. Maritana long ago found acceptance, for reasons which are not obscure; and no gathering of English amateurs, attracted by it needs to have the merits of the opera pointed out. Saturday's audience was not a very large one, but what it lacked in numbers it made up for in enthusiasm, being stimulated thereto by a performance which, taken for all in all, was very satisfactory. Scarcely could a better representative of the heroine be found than Miss Blanche Cole, who acted with extreme propriety and intelligence, while her singing was that of a refined and accomplished artist. We cannot mention all the successes achieved by Miss Cole throughout her very able assumption of the Gitana; but, to take one or two at random, her delivery of the romances, "It was a knight of princely mien," and "The harp in the air," must have satisfied the most exigent taste. So long as Miss Cole remains on the English lyric stage it cannot be said that English opera wants a light soprano competent to do any work that comes within her range. Miss Lucy Franklin was an intelligent and efficient Lazarillo, keenly alive to the demands of the drama, and singing throughout with great earnestness of feeling. Her delivery of "Alas, those chimes so sweetly pealing" elicited much and deserved applause. The Don Cæsar was Mr. Castle, an American tenor, of whose doings in the concert-room we have several times had to speak. This was, we believe, his début on the English stage, and he must be congratulated with reference to a decided success. His voice is somewhat hard, when forced; and he barely reaches the ideal of such a reckless, though always generous, character as Don Cæsar. But, this apart, his performance gave satisfaction in a high degree. Mr. Castle showed himself quite at home with the conventional stage business, and was especially successful in the contrasted songs, "Let me like a soldier fall," and "There is a flower that bloometh," both of which were unanimously encored. Were it not that he will probably return to America, we should hail Mr. Castle's advent as a genuine acquisition to the resources of English opera. Signor Federici played the King fairly, and sang "Hear me, gentle Maritana" so well as to gain an encore. He has an agreeable baritone voice and style of which a good deal may yet be made. Mr. Aynsley Cooke was called upon to repeat "In happy moments." The minor parts were efficiently played, and Herr Meyer Lutz conducted with care and skill.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

No reader of musical news will require to be told how much importance is given to music in the scheme of the Exhibition which opened at Kensington on Monday week. The very character and enterprise of the arrangements made with Her Majesty's commissioners by Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have compelled attention from the first, and excited a desire that success may attend an effort so manifestly excellent in its purpose. All we have to do, therefore, on the present occasion is to record the beginning of the orchestral and vocal concerts, which will continue daily while the Exhibition remains open. Two such concerts were given on Monday week, it being thought probable that a large holiday audience would attend. Owing, however, to the attraction of beautiful weather, the Exhibition was not patronized to the extent anticipated, and the music suffered equally with the rest of the "show." It may have been, also, that sufficient measures were not taken with a view to publicity. At all events, it could not be gathered from the advertisement columns of Easter Monday's journals that there was any Exhibition at all. None of these things, however, affected the character of the concerts, and the first performance showed that Mr. Barnby directs a capital orchestra, numbering in its ranks many of our best players, and quite competent to the high class of work that lies before it. The programmes were all that lovers of musical progress could desire. In the first were Auber's Exhibition overture, Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, and the excellent orchestral selection from Wagner's Lohengrin, arranged by Signor Arditi for one of his concerts a few years ago. These were played in admirable style, the quality of tone being good, and all due care being taken to obtain precision and expression. Mr. Barnby thus early showed himself at home with the orchestra, and the general effect produced under his intelligent guidance was quite satisfactory. At the second concert were played the overture to Guillaume Tell, Haydn's Surprise Symphony, Handel's Organ Concerto (No. 1), and the March from Gounod's Reine de Saba. When we say that Mr. Best was at the organ enough is said to prove that Handel's work lost nothing in the rendering. The vocal music, entrusted to Miss Walton and Mr. Thurley Beale, was all discreetly chosen and accompanied by the orchestra. Two concerts were also given on the following day, with the same programmes, since which the daily selections have included Beethoven's Symphony (No. 8), Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony, the overtures to Die Zauberflöte and Le Medecin malgré lui, Gounod's Saltarello, &c. These things speak for themselves, and we feel sure that the character of the Exhibition concerts only requires to be known in order to obtain general encouragement. It has often been a matter of reproach that London supports no orchestral concerts. The chance of doing so is now afforded, and we hope to see the reproach taken away, at all events for the present summer.

Since the above was written we have attended another concert—that of Wednesday last—and can speak with even greater emphasis as to the efficiency of Mr. Barnby's orchestra, and the general merits of the performance. The programme included the overture to Wagner's Der fliegende Holländer, which had not been heard in London since the production of the opera at Drury Lane in 1870. A more interesting selection could not possibly have been made. Next came Beethoven's Symphony, No. 5, admirably played, and followed by the Dance of Reapers, from Sullivan's music to the Tempest, the whole concluding with Auber's Exhibition overture. In addition to these orchestral works, Miss Dones sang in a style of great promise, Gounod's "There is a green hill" and "It it is finished" from Bach's Passion (St. John). Not a word need be said in praise of a concert so made up, and we will not entertain a doubt as to the success of an enterprise so thoroughly educational. To do the latter, would be to despair of the fortunes of music in this country.

LAFONT.

. . But a shadow was cast over all the evening's entertainment by a report—which, alas, turned out to be too true—that Lafont had just died. In England, where he was better known than any other French actor—except, perhaps, M. Regnier—he will be much regretted; and the recollection of the characters he played some four years ago will live long in the memory of all playgoers. His Montjoye especially stands out as one of the most masterly creations of the modern stage. But in Paris we have yet later and more vivid reminiscences of the fine old man. His Prince of Monaco, in Rabagas, was the most perfect ideal of a stage gentleman that can be imagined. His last impersonation of all, in Le Centenaire, was fully described in these columns. I cannot think of any living actor so happily suited for parts of this nature, and the death of Lafont leaves a gap in the French drama which may long remain unfilled.—Paris Correspondence of the Daily Telegraph.

LAST LETTER OF CATHERINE HAYES.

(From White's Echo of Many Lands.)

The author possesses a valued souvenir, the last autograph letter ever written by Catherine Hayes; and as it clearly indicates that she had a presentiment of her approaching dissolution, the public will, perhaps, be interested in its perusal, more especially as she died within a few days after its dispatch. The letter, which is now for the first time published, is as follows:—

18, Westbourne Park, London, W.

"My dear Friend,—I was very much delighted to receive your kind note, and thank you much for your kind gift of The Irish Princess. I hope when you come to London to have the pleasure of seeing you (if you are not too late), and I shall then be able to tell you what I anticipate; du reste, the gratification I had in reading your opera. I am so busy now, it is quite impossible to give time or thoughts to any particular thing, but the fashionable bill time that carries us all away during this the most successful season of many past. Thanks for the paper, and believe me ever yours sincerely,

BELLEW IN AMERICA.

(From the "Brighton Guardian.")

We have already informed the Brighton public of the success which Mr. J. M. Bellew, the celebrated reader and elocutionist, has obtained in America. Some additional particulars, which may be of interest, have now come to hand. During the first six nights of his New York engagement, Mr. Bellew netted £500. He is under an engagement by which he is to receive as his share half the gross receipts, a guarantee being given that on no night shall he receive less than £50. In May he will return from America to England, and he will then, no doubt, give a series of readings in this country with all his blushing Transatlantic honours fresh upon him. His stay in England will, however, be limited by an engagement he has entered into to return to America, in September, for another reading tour of one hundred nights, on the terms of half receipts and a guarantee of £60 per night. His friends expect that he will clear about £10,000 by this engagement. After such financial statements one is prepared to hear that Mr. Bellew's reception has been enthusiastic, and that the American critics are loud in his praise. The success of New York has been repeated, or rather distanced, in Boston, where, as the local Post says, "It is no easy task to win recognition." The Post not only "recognises" Mr. Bellew, but avers that "such a success has seldom or never before been secured by a public reader in this country within so short a space of time," and says that Mr. Bellew's return "will be anticipated with delight by the thousands of admirers he has conquered in this city." The Boston Post's "final estimate" of Mr. Bellew is that he is "the best reader who has ever appeared in Boston." The Bostonians have heard, it may be remarked, both Fanny Kemble and Charles Dickens. A few days later, one of the Globe staff "interviewed" Mr. Bellew, and produced in his journal an agreeable and comprehensive account of the interview, pronouncing Mr. Bellew "an accomplished conversationalist and profound thinker, and above all a whole-souled gentleman."

MR. TOM TAYLOR ON HAMLET.

Shakespere's Hamlet is at once, of all the master's works, the subtlest, most suggestive, and most metaphysical, and yet, of all his plays the oftenest acted and the most popular. It is said, indeed, that, taking town and country round, no play is so often seen on the stage in England as Hamlet, or so unfailing in its attraction, however presented. This popularity has given rise to an unusual familiarity with the play among actors. Every performer knows the part that belongs to his line in Hamlet. Many actors, in the course of their career, have acted every part, from lowest to highest; and of course all are familiar with the traditional business of the scenes. One result of this is that the play can be put upon the stage, in any theatre, at the shortest possible notice. Hence it is a play more often resorted to than any other in emergencies or for débuts; and none, as a rule, receives so little rehearsal, or is so often "pitchforked" on to the stage. Again, the cast includes so many parts, all in their degree important, that it is hardly possible to fill them all satisfactorily out of the company of any one theatre. In the next place, the very frequency of performance, and the universal acceptance of the traditional stage-business, have blunted the perception, in actors and audience alike, of the force of language and the significance of situations. Ordinary performances of the play have, in fact, become like outworn impressions from old plates—once vivid, precise, and delicate in light and shade, but by over use become course and smudged, untrue at once, and indistinct.

There seemed to me, therefore, when, lately, release from official life gave me more leisure for æsthetics, room for a representation of Hamlet, in which the stage business should be determined, and, if need be, remodelled, by study of the text, without implicit deference to tradition, in which time and care should be given to rehearsals, and a cast selected from many companies. In a regular theatre, at least with a night performance, this was hardly possible; but it seemed possible at the Crystal Palace in an afternoon performance, in which competition or collision with the theatres would be avoided, actors enabled to combine their work with existing night engagements, and the play brought out on a new stage, in which tradition had not yet established its rule—nowhere more rigid than in the theatre. Hence the experiment I am about to make, on and after Saturday, the 3rd of May. I have myself chosen the actors, cast the parts, seen to the designing of costumes, the conduct of rehearsals, the stage business, and the scenic arrangements. I have not aimed at novelty for novelty's sake in any of these respects. I have felt myself as free to depart from the traditional stage business, in many of the most important scenes, as I have been ready to accept it in others; and am influenced both in my deviations and my acceptance by the desire to give the fullest effect to the scenes and the situations, under the guidance of the text.

In Shakspere's day, with audiences in imaginative accord with the mighty magician who wrought his spells upon them, it was possible for spectators, as for poet, to dispense with all material aid from scenery, and all concern about costume. This is no longer possible. But it is still a nice practical question how far scenic illustration and costume may be carried without endangering the rightful supremacy of the acting. I have attempted to find this means for myself, with what success the public must decide. But in these points, again, my object has been not to seek display or correctness for their own sake, but solely with the motive of giving the fullest effect to the imaginative and dramatic elements of the play, and in the measure that seems to me best calculated to bring these into due relief. My object has been to produce Hamlet, not for the sake of the actor who is to play the part of the Prince of Denmark, but chiefly for artistic and æsthetic reasons, for the sake of the dramatic art and the public, with as complete a cast and appliances as I could obtain under the circumstances of the moment.

Tom Taylor.

The Late Mr. Augustus Harris.

Mr. Augustus Harris, the stage-director of the Royal Italian Opera, died of congestion of the lungs, on Saturday last, April 19th. He was the cleverest stage-manager of his time. He was engaged for the position he held at the theatre at the commencement of the Royal Italian Opera in 1847, and he mounted and superintended the mise-en-scène of every opera that was put on the stage from that time to this, with the exception of one season. His knowledge of costume of the different periods, his cleverness in grouping effects, and in stage arrangements generally, were marvellous, and scenic effects were never carried to such perfection in opera as under his guidance and superintendence. He was an accomplished linguist, speaking fluently several European languages, and a perfect master of his position. The Emperor of Russia appointed him stage-director of the Italian Opera at St. Petersburgh in recognition of the reputation he had acquired here—he going there in the winter season and returning to London in time for his duties at Covent Garden. He was also at certain periods engaged at Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, and Paris, in the same capacity. He succeeded the Shakesperian reign of Charles Kean at the Princess's Theatre, in 1859, as lessee, and its destinies were under his rule until 1862. He made his first appearance as an actor there in 1842.

I was at Dover, after the London season of 1845, when I made the acquaintance of Mr. Harris in a very singular way. One evening, seeing the performance of a London company announced at the theatre, I, with a friend, went there, when we found ourselves added to half-a-dozen others in the boxes; the pit contained about twenty occupants, and the gallery scarcely rivalled the pit in numbers. The performance was, however, given, but during its progress the curtain accidentally fell and knocked down the young lady who was performing the principal character, thus bringing it to a sudden termination. Her violent screams induced me to go behind the scenes and ascertain the extent of damage done, and offer any assistance I could give to her, when I found Mr. Harris (who was the "jeune première" of the company) doing all he could to comfort and help the young lady in her distressing position.

He was born at Naples in 1826, and died at the age of 47, respected and liked by all who knew him.—MS. Journal and Jottings, by Henry W. Goodban.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1873.

WE have received another letter from the poor outcast, "Miss English Opera," who manages, somehow, to raise the price of an occasional postage stamp. Here is the letter:—

SIR,—As I sat shivering "out in the cold," a passer-by dropped a copy of your valuable journal. I picked it up and eagerly read the leading article, which gives me some hope of being rescued from my fallen state, and once more holding the position I ought to hold by the side of my two sumptuously cared for sisters, Art and Science. I do not envy them, but feel proud of the rapid strides they are making in the world, and how they are encouraged and patronized by the wealthy and the Government! Ah! sir, had I been so cared for, I, too, might have done good service to the state, and been the means of keeping from the rising generation a vicious and degrading class of entertainments which has vulgarized and polluted, instead of refined and elevated, the mind.

With my now feeble voice I sing all honour to Messrs. Chappell and Novello, for their great exertions to raise chamber and "orchestral" music to the highest pitch of perfection; and when they have attained this desirable end, they will, perhaps, look from their stalls beyond the "Orchestra," and see what a large stage is lying waste, waiting to be cultivated again, and judiciously watched over, to make it what it was in my time, a thing of exquisite beauty, filling the air with sweet music. Yours very truly, MISS ENGLISH OPERA.

Door Step, Opera Colonnade, Haymarket.

There is something quite pathetic in the address given,—"Door-step, Opera Colonnade, Haymarket." It calls up an idea of homelessness peculiarly sad to the home-loving English nature—all the more sad in this case because the sufferer tells her story at the portals of an empty house, which, in some conceivable state of affairs, might be furnished as her residence. But touching pleas on the one hand and warm sympathy on the other can do little good. We live in a very matter-of-fact, prosaic, and practical world, which cannot be moved by mere sentiment, else would English opera have a home as sumptuous as her Italian sister. At present she asks for the impossible, unless her well-wishers are prepared to create a splendid pauper, and keep a roof over her head by "sending round the hat." All that can be done is to give the outcast temporary lodging now and then in places which happen to be vacated by the regular tenants—such lodging as that given to her on Saturday afternoons at the Gaiety Theatre. This, at all events, will keep her alive, and, in men's thoughts, till the advent of a time when she may exist upon her own resources, having no need for charity, or the sympathy of tender souls.

With the time just mentioned in view, those who are zealous for the English lyric stage will do well to remember that its prosperity can only be brought about by beginning at the beginning. The old order of things must be swept away leaving no "crack" to tell the tale of its existence, or to taint the new with reminiscences of a disgraceful past. As a matter of fact, there is very little to dispose of thus. Fate has reduced the actual repertory of English opera to Maritana, The Bohemian Girl, and Lurline, while we have few artists specially identified with the national lyric stage. In effect, the ground is clear for new composers and new performers. But how to obtain them? and how to get a public which shall support them when found? Here the old difficulty recurs, and the subject is found to be revolving in a vicious circle. But the last point should be left out of the question at present. Nobody can say that such a public would not be forthcoming, and nobody can do any great thing in this world without faith. Let the partisans of English opera therefore assure themselves that success will be proportionate to desert. It is so in the long run, and the fact should encourage the sustained and strenuous effort which alone can meet the exigencies of the case. The creation of a worthy English opera will be a work of years. It demands a school of composition, and one of technical education for artists, neither of which exists, even on paper. To attempt to do without both the one and the other would be complete folly. Dramatic musicians may exist among us in sufficient numbers, and lyric comedians may abound, but the need of both is cultivation and opportunity. Without these things their talent will remain as unproductive as that of Gray's "mute, inglorious Milton;" or else it will assume the fantastic, ill-regulated shapes of which there are already examples sufficient.

But who is to establish our school of opera! The Government will not do so much is very certain. The Royal Academy of Music cannot—that is equally sure. Will "South Kensington" come to the rescue? If it did, it would be opposed by almost universal distrust. There remains the Crystal Palace, which has already done something in a casual and spasmodic way. We believe the great Sydenham establishment to be the sole hope of English Opera. Why, we believe this must appear to all who give the matter a serious thought. The Crystal Palace has resources in hand. It has a theatre, without the necessity of paying rent; it commands a public, unexacting because gratified by a hundred other attractions beneath the same roof; and it inspires confidence, because every enterprise it undertakes is carried out with spirit and success. Surely the ingenious managers of the Glass Palace can discover the way to utilise this unique position; not injuring themselves, while giving fresh life to a decayed branch of art. An hour's earnest thought over the matter will do more for English opera than all the virtuous indignation in the world. Is not the fortune of our lyric stage worth so much of effort?

THE Pall Mall Gazette of Tuesday, April 22, informs us that—"Madame Arabella Goddard sailed from Southampton, yesterday (Monday), for the United States."

ROYAL GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, Happy Arcadia, after a very long and successful run, will be withdrawn on Monday, May 5th, when a new entertainment by Mr. F. C. Burnand will be produced, under the title of Mildred's Well; or a Romance of the Middle Ages; the said romance taking place in the present century—a chronological error which will be fully explained by the author. The music, our readers will be very glad to hear, is by Mr. German Reed. Mr. Corney Grain, who promises a new musical sketch in a few days, will give All Abroad for the 160th time; and the very clever and amusing fishing piece, entitled Very Catching, will conclude the entertainment.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A STATEMENT has gone the round of the papers to the effect that the viol di gamba was to be publicly played last night in Exeter Hall, for the first time these ninety years. This is incorrect. The viol di gamba, admirably performed upon by Mr. Pettit, might have been heard any Friday in the Lent just past, at the Church of St. Anne, Soho; and might have been heard also at several of the Exhibition Concerts in Albert Hall, notably that of Wednesday last.

---

THE subjoined new regulation has been made by the Directors of the National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace:—

"No Member of the Council of Musicians, who may have given instruction to any Competitor, or who might be directly or indirectly interested in the success of any Competitor, is eligible to serve on the Jury of the Class in which such Competitor may have entered."

This is perfectly fair, and so obvious that we wonder at its having been delayed till now.

WE are all more or less familiar with descriptive music from the time-honoured "Battle of Prague" to the various fantasias christened "Moonlight," "Absence," "Sleepless Nights," &c. A certain vagueness in the title is necessary to secure a sympathy between the mind of the composer and the imagination of the listener. It is quite possible to imagine moonlight described in musical phrases, but the artist must not attempt too much. A descriptive fantasia, entitled "The Fall of Paris and the Fortresses," just advertised, seems to promise rather more than could be performed. Besides several marches, this piece introduced the flag of truce, the sentinel on guard, the sortie from Paris, and, finally, the English feeding the Parisians. This last circumstance must be extremely difficult to describe musically. The rattle of knives and forks might, perhaps, be imitated, but it is difficult to conceive the sound of eating being accurately rendered by the most complicated harmony, especially as it is essential to mark that the French only were engaged in the consumption of the food, under the kind auspices of the English.

THE Richard Wagner Association for promoting the performance of the Nibelungen at Bayreuth—an association under the immediate patronage of the Emperor of Germany, the King of Bavaria, and the Grand Duke of Saxe-Coburg—lately held a meeting to settle its constitution. The principal statutes are as follow:—Every person purchasing a ticket, payable in three instalments of five florins each, in December, 1871; January, 1872; and January, 1873, is a member of the association. One person may become the possessor of several tickets. Tickets may also be purchased at a subsequent date, as far as the number of patron's certificates will allow, by supplementary payments. With the amount accruing from the sale of the tickets, patron's certificates will be purchased; for these, lots will afterwards be drawn by the members. For every thirty-five original tickets there will be an entire patron's certificate worth 300 thalers, or three thirds of a certificate, at 100 thalers each third. Each such part of a certificate entitles the holder to witness the representation of the entire work, that is to say, the four performances. The association furthermore undertakes, by getting up concerts, &c., to render the drawing for the certificates more favourable for the members by purchasing with the receipts of the concerts, &c., additional certificates, to be distributed among them. The association will also procure patrons' certificates from the central office for all persons desiring to become at once patrons of the undertaking. The performance of the "Festival-Stage-Play" will take place in the summer of 1874. The list of those who have taken tickets is already considerable, and among the names there are some very well known.

ROME.—A new opera, Il Conte Verdi, by Sig. Libano, was successfully produced, at the Teatro Apollo, on the 6th inst. Sig. Libano, who is a private gentlemen, young and rich, had already produced an opera, La Guinara, in Florence. The principal parts in Il Conte Verdi were sustained by Signore Wisjak, Ugolini, Signori Aldighieri and Gayarre. The composer was not in the theatre the first night, on account of a domestic calamity, but, on the second, he was called for and appeared nine or ten times.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Miss Lillie Edmonds gave a concert on Wednesday evening, which attracted an overflowing audience to the Store Street Music Hall. The bénéficiaire sang with much taste, "I would I were a little bird," "The Naiades," and with Mr. J. Bolton, John Parry's A B C duet, in all of which she was deservedly applauded. Mr. Bolton gave the ballad of "Dearer to my soul thou art," with feeling and expression. Miss Alice Phillips, a daughter of Mr. Henry Phillips, displayed her voice to advantage in a song, "The cloud-cap't towers," and received great applause. Mdlle. Bonacich, Signor Salvini, and Mr. Pellissier, an accomplished amateur, gave some songs and concerted pieces admirably, the latter in Signor Tito Mattei's drinking song, "Lo Scapeto," was encored. Mr. F. Danville sang excellently the popular serenade, "Wake Linda, wake," and received an encore, as did also Mdme. Emmeline Thomas in a song with a harp accompaniment (well played by Mr. F. Chatterton). Among the instrumental performances worthy of notice was the playing of Miss. A. L. Okey, an Australian pianist only seven years of age, who performed in a perfect manner, and to the entire satisfaction of all present, Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, exhibiting wonderful execution for one so young. The Misses Clara Cox, Lucy Cramer, Annie Beech, with Messrs. John Barrow, W. C. Bell, and C. F. Webb contributed several vocal and instrumental pieces which added much to the success of the concert. Mr. Fred Chatterton was deservedly encored in a harp solo, and Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, with Messrs. Clarke, C. F. Webb, and Signor Zuccardi, were most efficient conductors.

Mr. Ransford gave his annual ballad concert on Monday evening, at St. James's Hall, and, we are glad to state, with decided success, the hall being full and fashionably attended. Mr. Ransford had a phalanx of talent to carry out his programme. The "Bijou Madrigal Union" sang several part-songs of a popular character, Madame Florence Lancia was encored in both her songs; Miss Ransford gave a song by J. R. Thomas, and sang two duets, one with her father, the other with Miss Alice Barth, in all of which she received the unanimous applause of the audience. Miss A. Barth, in Balfe's popular Irish ballad, "Killarney," displayed her voice to much advantage, as did also Madame Patey in a song by G. B. Allen, "Who can tell," and a song by Stanislaus. Mr. Ransford, on his appearance, received quite an ovation from his friends. The veteran sang, with his usual vigour, "Hearts of oak" and "Simon the cellarer"; he was loudly encored, giving the latter with great spirit. Mr. George Perren sang "Mary of Argyle" and the "Bay of Biscay," receiving an encore amid loud applause; as did also Messrs. Lloyd and Santley in "All's well." The former sang "The Pilgrim of love" and a song of Balfe's; the latter gave, with his accustomed excellence, a song of Blumenthal's, accompanied by the composer, and one of Hatton's, receiving tumultuous applause. Mr. Patey, whom everyone wishes to hear oftener, contributed "Down amongst the dead men;" Mr. Frederick Chatterton, his harp solo, "Remembrance of Italy," with great effect; and Mr. Sydney Smith, on the pianoforte, gave, in a brilliant manner, his "Irish air," and, on being encored, substituted his "Harp Æolienne," both of which were much and deservedly applauded. Messrs. Stanislaus, Ganz, and Lindsay Sloper were the accompanists.

Milan.—Signor Perelli's new opera, Viola Pisani, has proved an utter failure at the Scala.

A HINT FOR WINCHESTER.

(From "Another World.")

I may here mention that a general feature in the correction of faults is the absence of violent punishment. We wish to raise and not degrade our children, and, perhaps, thereby implant the seeds of cruelty. We do not correct even our animals by blows. Horses, for instance, are never struck. Whips, with a small thong at the ends, are used only to flourish and to make sounds which the horse knows, but they are not used to strike the animal. Other modes are employed for curing viciousness, each according to the nature of the vice. In the case of a kicking horse, he is placed in a machine which is closed on him, the machine being so constructed that when shut it effectually prevents the animal moving, and he is kept there in the same position for hours. If, when taken out, he again kicks, he is placed back immediately. The process is repeated, when necessary, over and over, until the very sight of the machine will completely cow the animal, and he is effectually cured. The laws are very severe against those who ill-treat animals, but there is now no longer need to put them in force.

PROVINCIAL.

Exeter.—Mr. Ashe gave an afternoon and evening concert, on Thursday, April 17th, in the Victoria Hall, to large and fashionable audiences. The services of the following artists were retained, viz., Mdlle. Nita Gaetano and Signor Foli in the vocal department; with the celebrated lady violinist, Madame Norman Néruda, Signor Piatti (violoncello), and Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte), in the instrumental. Among the principal features of the morning programme was Mdlle. Gaetano's rendering of Mozart's "Batti, batti," the violoncello obbligato being exquisitely played by Signor Piatti. Signor Foli created the usual sensation, while the instrumental portion of both entertainments was received with enthusiastic applause.—On Friday and Saturday, 18th and 19th, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul occupied the building, and were well patronised.—Madame Dowland's Matinée Musicale d'Invitation took place on Saturday (19th), in the Royal Public Rooms, and was numerously attended. The vocalists were Mr. George Cox and Madame Dowland. Miss Adda Brevitor, pupil of Mr. Lyon, made a successful début, and, with Mr. G. R. Kenyse and Mr. G. W. Lyon, also pianists, assisted greatly in making Madame Dowland's venture an unqualified success.—J. J.

Hertford.—The concert in the Corn Exchange, on Wednesday, April 16, under the immediate patronage of Lieut.-Colonel Earl Cowper, K.G., and the officers of the 2nd Battalion Herts Rifle Volunteers, was decidedly the best ever given in this town. The vocalists were Mdme. Florence Lancia, Miss Purdy, Mr. Trelawney Cobham, and Signor Caravoglia. Mr. W. Ganz was the pianist. The band of the battalion, under the direction of Bugle-Major Bailey, assisted by playing in capital style selections from popular operas, Mr. Bailey himself contributing a clarionet solo by Bressant. The vocalists were in capital "form," Mdme. Lancia being compelled to repeat "There's a path by the river," and a duet (with Signor Caravoglia) from Don Pasquale. Miss Purdy, whose fine contralto voice was greatly admired, was encored in Mr. Cowen's agreeable song, "Marguerite," and sang Sullivan's "Looking back" with earnestness and pathos; Mr. Trelawney Cobham receiving the same compliment for his expressive singing of Blumenthal's "Message;" and Signor Caravoglia for his spirited delivery of "Largo al factotum." The two gentlemen were also called upon to repeat a duet by Masini. Mr. Ganz came in for a share of applause for his capital performance of some small pianoforte pieces by Schumann and Herr Silas, and his own very popular "Qui vive Galop."

REVIEWS.

Boosey & Co.

Nothing. Song. Poetry by Alice Horton. Music composed expressly for and dedicated to Mr. Sims Reeves by Henriette.

The words of this song are very pretty and piquant. Here is the first verse as sample:—

O say, sweet eyes,
Like lake-reflections of Italian skies,
Does looking up with sudden, soft surprise,
Mean nothing?
O lips, ripe red,
Do all the tender nothings uttered,
Since ye to curve, and curl, and pout, were bred,
Mean nothing?
O little hand,
So soft to touch, so royal to command,
Do clinging fingers in fair lady-land
Mean nothing?

Henriette has exactly caught and reflected the spirit of these words in her music, which is not less pretty and piquant, though as simple and easy as the least efficient amateur could desire. "Nothing" may safely be depended upon for effect by every one who is asked to sing something.

Breslau.—Mdme. Wilt, from Vienna, took part in the twelfth concert given by the Orchestral Union, when she sang the aria from Die Enführung, "Ah, Perfido," by Beethoven, and several songs by Franz and Kirchner. The orchestra, under the direction of Herr B. Scholz, performed the prelude to Herr R. Wagner's Tristan und Isolde; the Turkish March, by Beethoven, and Symphony in A major, by Mendelssohn.

Dusseldorf.—The Oratorio Vocal Association lately gave a most interesting concert, under the direction of Herr Th. Ratzenberger. The first part of the programme comprised various sacred compositions; the second consisted exclusively of a work never before heard here, the Historia vom Leiden und Sterbens unsers Hrn Jesu Christ, by Heinrich Schütz, the predecessor of Bach, and the inventor of the Passion-Oratorio, which culminated a century later in Bach's Matthäuspassion.

An Unpublished Ballet by Mozart (1778).*

Seldom, perhaps, has a man of genius experienced with such bitterness the disappointments of life, as Mozart did on his third and last attempt to introduce his music into the French capital. Despite the zealous support of his Mannheim friends, Wendling, the flute player, and Raaff, the singer, he could not succeed in overcoming the distrust which theatrical managers and concert-directors entertained then, as they entertain now, towards an unknown artist, so that he was at last obliged to be contented with a commission from the ballet-master Noverre to compose the music to a new ballet, and to oblige his new patron by consenting that his name should not appear in the bills.

Mozart, shamelessly plundered by a musical swindler, and presented to the public of the French Opera under a false name, is certainly a remarkable fact, the authenticity of which, however, is corroborated by the composer himself when writing to his father (See Otto Jahn, Das Leben Mozart's, Part II.) But something still more remarkable is: that the score of this ballet, which was long believed lost, still exists, in the library of the Grand Opera, where, in consequence of my representations, it was discovered, without any particular trouble, by my colleague, M. Nuitter. A glance at the score is sufficient to distinguish the numbers mentioned by Mozart as his from the others. Before, however, examining them more carefully, it would, perhaps, be as well to devote a few words to the subject of Noverre's ballet, as well as to the circumstances of the period when it was produced.

When Mozart, on the 23rd March, 1778, visited Paris for the third time, the Académie de Musique had just gone through a kind of administrative revolution, inasmuch as it had, by a Royal decree, been withdrawn from the authority of the city and the Intendants of the "Menus Plaisirs," and transferred to the hands of a private individual, Devismes du Valgay, who was thenceforward to carry it on with sovereign sway at his own risk and peril.† At first sight, the task did not appear a difficult one; during the preceding five years, Gluck had completely renewed the national repertory and presented French opera with a pleiad of masterpieces, the last of which, Armide (first produced on the 23rd September, 1777,) was not inferior to the rest, either in intellectual importance or material success. Suard's pamphlets, La Harpe's shameless attacks, the Abbé Arnaud's caustic replies, and Marmontel's epigrams, had, it is true, stimulated party feeling, but they were far from frightening away the public; on the contrary, they rather excited its curiosity, and thus contributed to benefit the theatre pecuniarily.

One would have thought that Gluck's departure must have put an end to these disputes, or, at least, have diminished the musical excitement. But such was by no means the case, for, despite the absence of the Commander-in-Chief, the contest was continued more bitterly than ever. The seat of war alone was changed, being transferred, from want of nourishment, from the theatre to the papers and salons. This was not at all to the taste of the new manager, who would willingly have seen the whole conflict prolonged ad infinitum, on the condition of its being carried on in his theatre. A man of restless and enterprising mind, he was ready to make any sacrifice to revive the flame which seemed about to expire; and, as he thought it would be easy to arouse once more the party of old French opera, by which means the noisy successes of 1752 would be repeated, he sent for an Italian company, at very considerable expense, to perform Piccini's most important works under the direction of Piccini himself.‡

This company, a comic one, opened on the 11th June, 1778, with Le finte Gemelle (The Sham Twins), followed in the bills by Les petits Riens, ballet-pantomime, by Noverre. Unluckily for Devismes, Gluck's grandiose style, tragic recitatives, and melodies, which seemed cast in bronze, had by this time thoroughly weaned the French ear from the Italian cantilena. The nation had been so transformed by the man who preferred "the Muses to the Sirens," that they now sought enjoyment in a sterner kind of art, and felt the truth of the maxim: "res severa verum gaudium;" consequently, despite Piccini's insinuating melodies, and the merit of some of the singers, Le finte Gemelle was played before a gaping audience.

A satirical poem, circulated at the time, records the prevailing feeling:—

"Avec son opéra bouffon,
L'ami Devismes nous morfond;
Si c'est ainsi qu'il se propose
D'amuser les Parisiens,
Mieux vaudrait rester porte close,
Que de donner si peu de chose
Accompagné de petits riens."

Despite, however, the touch of malice in the last two verses where the "peu de chose" is coupled with the "petits riens," the new ballet was more successful than the opera imported from beyond the Alps. Whether Noverre's work merited the indulgence which was refused to Piccini's, I cannot say, as all my researches for the libretto, both in the Bibliothèque Nationale, and in the library of the Opera have been fruitless. Luckily, however, the Journal de Paris, of the 12th June, contains the gist of the work, and thus enables the reader to form an opinion about it. The article in this paper runs thus word for word*:—

"After Le finte Gemelle was produced for the first time, Les petits Riens, ballad-pantomime, in three episodical, and nearly independent scenes, by Noverre. The first of the scenes is purely Anacreontic: Amor caught in a net, and shut up in a cage, most agreeably represented by Mdlle. Guimard and Vestris, who develop all the grace inherent to the subject. The second is Blind-Man's-Buff, where d'Auber-Val, the popular favourite, sustains the principal part; while, in the last, a roguish Cupid brings to a couple of shepherdesses a third disguised as a shepherd. Mdlle. Asselin plays the part of the Shepherd, and Mdlles. Guimard and Allard, the parts of the Shepherdesses: the latter fall in love with the pretended shepherd, who, at length, puts an end to the deception, by uncovering his bosom, the piquant nature of the scene being increased by the skill and grace of the three celebrated dancers. We must mention, moreover, at the moment of Mdlle. Asselin's showing the two shepherdesses they were deceived, several voices called out, Da capo, and that the intricate dance-figures, with which the ballet concludes, were greatly applauded."

Brooklyn.—The fourth concert of the fifteenth season of the Philharmonic Society was given on Saturday evening, March 29, at the Academy of Music, with the following artists: Mis Annie Louise Clary (contralto), Mr. Richard Hoffman (pianist), and Mr. Carl Bergman (conductor). Miss Cary sang admirably, and Mr. Hoffman obtained unusual success, from the fact of the orchestra not playing too loudly, so that the piano was heard distinctly. The programme was one of the best of the season, and the solo artists, as well as the orchestra, acquitted themselves entirely to the satisfaction of the audience.

Brunswick.—Herr Carl Müller, the founder, and first violin, of the celebrated Müller Quartet, died here, at a very advanced age, on the 4th inst.

Darmstadt.—The question of the erection of a new theatre in the place of that burnt down has lately been occupying the attention of the Landtag, or Parliament. Herr Semper, the well-known architect, has prepared three different plans. The expense of carrying out one of them would involve an expenditure of from 1,200,000 to 1,600,000 florins. To this would have to be added the cost for scenery, machinery, decorations, etc., amounting to about half a million. In consequence of the large outlay they would involve, these plans have been laid aside for another plan which, retaining the outer walls, which are still standing, of the old Theatre, would not require for its realisation a larger sum than from 800,000 to 900,000 florins. If this plan were adopted, no very large grant would be required from the State, and the Landtag would, in all probability, vote the necessary sum.

Glogau.—A performance of the Abbate Franz Liszt's oratorio, Die heilige Elisabeth, was given recently in the Stadttheater.

‡ It was in 1729 that the first Italian (comic) operatic company came to Paris. They performed two works, Il Giocatore and Don Micco e Lesbina, but did not make any impression. A second company, who appeared in 1752, caused, on the contrary, a genuine revolution with Pergolese's Serva Padrona, which achieved a well nigh fanatical success. It may here be mentioned, as a fact but little known, that this same work of Pergolese's had been previously brought out as far back as the 4th October, 1746, at the Comédie Italienne, without attracting any particular attention. ## SOMETHING ABOUT L'AFRICAINE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Much surprise was evinced, I am sure, when the opera chosen this year for the opening night at Covent Garden was L'Africaine; and I am pleased my humble but earnest suggestion, contained in a letter to you last year, appears now to be carried out—i.e., the repeated performances of the work.

Without wishing to disparage the already given performances this year, I cannot comprehend (save enabling artists to display their talent as a début, to which nothing can be said against) how it is, when the Covent Garden original important characters are absent—one of them chosen by the composer himself—that the opera should suddenly be performed as often in three weeks as it was during the last two seasons put together, when the co-operation of the now absentees was available.

Anticipating the speedy arrival of the promised original artists, including the Queen of Queens—the incomparable Pauline Lucca—I remain, dear sir, yours truly,

London, 22nd April, 1873. O. L.

WAIFS.

CORRECTION OF FAULTS IN CHILDREN.—We never punish by the imposition of tasks, our aim being to inculcate the love of study, and encourage the child to regard his work as a favour and a privilege. On the contrary we now punish the student rather by taking away the old than by imposing new schoolwork; and this is so effected that the boy, though at first delighted, soon thirsts to resume his studies. In many cases the pupil is not allowed even to know that he is punished,—i.e., why the discipline is changed,—lest he should become attached to a fault for which he has suffered and, as it were, paid dearly; lest, too, the excitement of eluding detection should make it pleasurable to transgress when the immediate pressure is removed, and he should thus become schooled in untruthfulness and deceit.—"Another World."

Mr. Vernon Rigby is engaged as principal tenor at the Bristol Festival, which is to be conducted by Mr. Hallé.

The death is announced of M. Bender, band-master of the Belgian regiment of Guides, and army inspector of music.

The death of Domenico Donselli, the once celebrated tenor singer, is announced. He died at Bologna in his 81st year.

A series of evening concerts, choral and orchestral, will begin in the Royal Albert Hall next month, conducted by Mr. Barnby.

Mr. Bellew (now in America) will read, in Brighton, twice or thrice before he commences his new engagement in the United States.

Madame Liebhart, says an American paper, of the Rubinstein troupe, will spend the summer with Madame Lucca at her Newport villa.

The Clothworkers' Company have voted a gift of twenty-five guineas to the Great Marlborough Street Hospital for Diseases of the Skin.

Sir M. Costa's oratorio, Eli, is to be given at the Glasgow Festival, under the direction of its composer, who generously gives his services.

M. Lafont, the celebrated French comedian, whose death is announced in Paris, was the uncle of the accomplished pianist, Mdlle. Eugénie Coulon, of London.

We understand that Mr. Henry Smart's new oratorio, Jacob, which is to be performed at the Glasgow Festival, will be published by Messrs. J. B Cramer and Co.

Hamlet has been produced at Vienna with, it is said, great success. Mdlle. Grossi played Ophelia, and Mdlle. Brandt the Queen. Both ladies, we need hardly say, were in London last season.

Signor Gaetano Ferri has succeeded Signor Merelli as the impresario of the Italian Operahouses at Moscow and St. Petersburg. Herr Julius Sulzer has received the Imperial authorization in Vienna to establish a permanent Italian Operahouse in that capital.

We hear of a successful new opera at Mahon, Island of Minorca, of all places in the world, and a Shakesperean one, being another setting of Romeo and Juliet. The young composer, Antonio Mercadet, a native of Mahon, had an "ovation" on the first representation.

The following works are in the programme of the Lower Rhine Festival, to be held next month at Aix-la-Chapelle:—Handel's Messiah, Mozart's Davidde Penitente, Beethoven's overture, Op. 115, and Choral Symphony, Rietz's Festival Overture, Mendelssohn's Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Schumann's pianoforte Concerto, and a violin concerto by Spohr.

At Milan, the late Lord Lytton's Zanoni, has been made the subject of an opera—Viola Pisani—by E. Perelli.

A puzzled American critic says:—"The Liszt Symphony was, after all, the principal feature of the concert. We confess honestly that we could not understand it, and so will not attempt to criticise it. It was tender, touching, plaintive, sad, startling, terrific, stupendous, overwhelming—but we won't exhaust our entire stock of adjectives. Was it a really great and noble composition? We give it up."

According to some wildly-credulous foreign papers Mdme. Adelina Patti was so overcome by the warmth of her reception on the occasion of her farewell performance in St. Petersburg, that she fainted, and Mdme. Nillsson-Rouzeaud, forgetting her marriage, begged her manager to be allowed to remain in that city a while longer, because the people of the Russian capital were her "betrothed."

The Liverpool papers speak in high terms of a young lady named Holcroft, (a descendant of the author of the "Road to Ruin"), who has made her début as a vocalist, at the Amphitheatre, in Mr. Falconer's drama of Killarney. The Daily Post says:—"Miss Holcroft, who appears as Norah, sings Balfe's pretty song, 'Killarney,' with a beauty and expression that quite charms the house. She has a sympathetic and good voice, and her sweet rendering of the song has to be repeated every night."

Herr Kaufmann, the Burgomaster of Bonn, who is chairman of the Schumann Festival, to be held the second week in August next, has issued a circular inviting support. The proceeds are to be devoted to the erection of a monument, with the composer's effigy, over his grave, in the cemetery just outside the Sternenthor gate of Bonn. We cannot, however, conceive a more fitting and touching memorial than the existing tombstone, shaded as the spot is with overhanging trees. Herr Wasielwski, the Music Director of Bonn, and Schumann's biographer will manage the proposed Festival.

In a late number of the Contemporary Review is a learned and entertaining paper by the Rev. H. R. Haweis on "Violins." Speaking of the immense sums paid for old instruments by celebrated makers, he says:—"1,500 acres of land in Cincinnati were on one occasion given for a 'Stainer;' and as the city of Pittsburgh is now built upon that very land, we may confidently say that this has turned out to be the heaviest price ever paid for a violin." The discovery that Pittsburg is built on 1,500 acres of land in Cincinnati is a contribution to knowledge that should entitle Mr. Haweis to an honourable membership of the Geographical Society.—Watson.

A spiritualist sends to Dexter Smith a letter from the spirit of the Newburyport boy-ghost, and a harmless little song which it is claimed was written out—words and music—from the dictation of the youthful phantom. The boy-ghost states that he was flogged to death for having stolen his teacher's watch, and that if either of the Newburyport committee men will visit the school-house alone at midnight he will make "a startling revelation" to him. It would appear that this candid if dishonest youth is an unappreciated musical genius. Music has often formed an element of ghostly demonstrations, though individual musicians have seldom been manifest.

MOORE AND WASHINGTON IRVING.—I found Irving plain, and rather farmer-like in appearance, but perfectly gentlemanly and cordial in conversation and manner. Speaking of matters relative to Moore, he informed me that "he sold in the States as many copies of the bard's Life of Byron, as enabled him to purchase Sloperton Cottage. "But," he continued with a smile, "when our friend Tom subsequently sent me his Irish Gentleman in search of a Religion, all my exertions could not gain a footing or a reception for him, and after many fruitless efforts I was reluctantly obliged to send back the poor gentleman without any religion at all."—White's Echoes of Many Lands.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, the case of "Toole v. Young" was mentioned. This was an action under the Copyright Act, tried before the Lord Chief Justice at Guildhall, when the plaintiff was nonsuited, with leave to enter a verdict for him. It appeared that Mr. Hollingshead wrote a tale for Good Words, entitled "Not Above his Business," which he afterwards dramatised under the name of Shop, and sold to the plaintiff, the celebrated comedian. The defendant had represented a piece called Glory, which, it was alleged, was an infringement of Shop. It was admitted that Glory contained several passages the same as those in Shop; but it had been much enlarged. The tale having been published first, it was contended, on the part of the defendant, that it was no infringement, because every one had a right to draw from a common source for the plot and incidents of his drama. If the drama had been written first and the title afterwards, there would have been dramatic copyright. Sir John Karslake, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Q.C., and Mr. Kelly, now moved for a new trial on the leave reserved. Rule granted.

Mr. Francis Bazin was elected on Saturday a member of the French Academy of Beaux Arts, musical section, vice M. Carafa, deceased.

Mr. Charles Swain, of Manchester, author of "The Mind," and other poems, has had a serious attack of illness, from which he is slowly recovering.

Thomas Jefferson is known to have solaced his leisure hours by playing the violin, on which he was proficient. His fondness for the instrument may be inferred from the following anecdote, quoted from his "Domestic Life," recently published by Harper and Brothers:—"In the year 1770, the house at Shadwell was destroyed by fire, and Jefferson moved to Monticello, where his preparations for a residence were sufficiently advanced to enable him to make it his permanent abode. He was from home when the fire took place at Shadwell, and the first enquiry he made of the negro who carried him the news was after his books. 'Oh, my young master,' he replied, carelessly, 'they were all burned; but ah! we saved your fiddle.'"

Tourists in the Highlands are not unfrequently treated, as I have been, to the music of the national instrument, the bagpipes, whose wild, shrill tones, when heard reverberating through the distant hills of Scotland, produce a most extraordinary effect. Dr. Johnson, while travelling here with his friend Boswell, on being asked his opinion of the instrument, &c., at once declared it to be "the voice of uproar and misrule." Johnson, to say the least of him, had neither ear nor taste for music, and would perhaps have expressed himself in a similar manner if asked to listen awhile to the voice of a Lind, a Tietjens, a Nilsson, or a Mario. Being at a concert once with a musical friend (who admired the performance of an exquisite solo on the violin), he turned and whispered into the ear of the Doctor, "How exquisite, how difficult!" when Johnson instantly growled out, "I wish it were impossible." In comparing some of the Scotch and Irish melodies, I found the closest family likeness and connection between them, just as all over the Highlands to this day, whole winter evenings are spent in relating the adventures of Irish kings, and the loves of Milesian maids. —From White's Echoes of Many Lands.

The death of the French actor Lafont will create a void in the Parisian theatrical world. Born in 1801, he had passed the allotted limit, not only of dramatic existence, but of human life. Lafont was brought up to be a surgeon, and in that capacity made two voyages to India on board a man-of-war. He came to Paris with the intention of studying for the opera in 1822, but he soon abandoned this idea, and we find him joining the Vaudeville company, and playing parts which had previously been taken by Gonthier, a celebrated actor of that period. When the Vaudeville was burned in 1839, he formed part of the troupe at the Variétés, where many of his creations, such as Le Chevalier de Saint Georges, Le Lion Empaillé and Les Deux Brigadiers, proved an immense success. Lafont returned to the Vaudeville—the old house on the Place de la Bourse—in 1855, where he played the parts of the Marquis in Les Gandches, and of Raoul in Montjoye. His two latest achievements were in Sardou's Rabagas, at the new Vaudeville, and in Le Centenaire. No one who saw him as the Prince of Monaco in the former of these pieces could have believed that he was witnessing the performance of an actor who was born with the present century, for his natural air of distinction and easy grace might have been envied by many a gandin over whose head less than thirty summers had passed. Lafont was to have visited London in the course of the present season, and the French company now playing at the Princess's Theatre will be at a loss to fill his place.

During the vintage the people employed in the different vineyards of Medoc, whether they live in the district or have come from afar, generally devote their evenings to dancing, and many give themselves up to drinking as well. The strolling vintagers travel about accompanied by their own musicians, who, in the majority of instances, are either halt or blind. Proceeding towards Pauillac in the evening, just as work was over, I came upon troops of vintagers returning home, clad for the most part in rags a trifle less brilliant than the rainbow, with attendant musicians playing some lively tune on violins held bass-viol fashion, fifes, hurdy-gurdies, and guitars; while the bronze-complexioned, bare-legged, bright-eyed, grape-besmeared children of the party danced merrily around them. Curiosity led me to follow one of these troops into the town hostelry. . . . A few of the vintagers drank out of stout glasses, but the men, as a rule, preferred raising the large cans to their lips, and drinking from the spout. When the dinner was finished the tables were moved on one side, and fiddlers and grinders of the hurdy-gurdy seated themselves on casks, and struck up some lively tune; whereupon men and women danced a monotonous kind of waltz, the figure of which was remarkably simple, and never by any chance varied save when some dancer who had taken too much wine avoured the company with an extravagant pas seul. All the time dancing was going on a large, oft-replenished can of wine stood on a side table for those to help themselves who pleased.—Hool Partridge.

Miss Rose Hersee has lately had an interview with President Grant at the White House.

A correspondent of the New York Musical Gazette thus describes a visit to the old African church in Richmond, Virginia:—

"This has been for generations the leading coloured church in the city. The congregation is very large, and the sight is an interesting one. Every seat is filled, and many are usually standing by the doors. The whole number could not be less than 700. I was struck by the general appearance of neatness in young and old alike, and nothing could be more quiet and orderly than their behaviour. It is their custom to assemble about half an hour before the time of service, and spend the time in singing their "spiritual songs." No one who has witnessed the scene can ever forget it. Strange to say, the most characteristic feature of the performance is its quietness and repose. There is no appearance of haste, and no excitement. People come in quietly and take their seats till the room is about half full. At this point (the congregation still continuing to assemble) a low murmur is heard, at first hardly distinguishable from the rustling of incoming members. It proves to be a voice, but the ear fails to discern as yet a positive melody. It gradually becomes more distinct, and as it does so, a soft beating sound is heard in various parts of the room. It is from the feet of merry "worshippers," who thus respond to the rhythmic flow before they are fully prepared to join with their voices. But these are soon added, and the tide of song rises and falls with ever-varying solo and chorus, strophe and antistrophe, unison singing and part-singing, till the self-appointed leader becomes weary, or reaches the end of his list of verses, or for whatever reason he concludes to stop. A brief interval of silence then ensues, after which we hear another murmur, and the same experience is repeated. If a revival is in progress, the excitement, of courses reaches a much higher pitch. Then we have the violent swaying of the body, the walking to and fro, the falling insensible to the floor, and other effect, which result from the stimulated nervous condition into which they are gradually brought through the influence of their own wild songs. Of the songs themselves I will not undertake to speak."

"Independant Journalism," of which we have all heard so much, is undoubtedly a fine thing and to be desired, particularly in criticism. The great West, that region of pork and prairie, of divorce laws and Chicago, has apparently made to itself a solemn vow that it will go "one better" than anything produced nearer the rising sun. Consequently the independent critic is there developed to an abnormal extent. Ruthless as Jeffrey, in the early days of the Edinburgh Review, fertile in fanciful comparisons as a reorganized Swinburne, he measures out epithets by the yard and illustrations by the mile. Stock companies he rejoices to demolish; concert singers fall like reeds before his galling paragraphs. No cherry tree of fame or reputation is secure from his little hatchet. With vast drafts upon imagination and a reckless variety of syllepsis, he concocts articles which fairly astound the reader by the glimpses they afford into hitherto unexplored regions of combinable English. Here, for example, is one of his latest efforts in the Peoria Review:—

"Mdlle. Liebhart didn't leave a dry eye in the wigwam when she sang 'There sno plash li kome,' and it was the general impression among her German auditors that she sang 'Rawbing Awdah' in English, while the English-speaking inhabitants were equally positive that 'Robin Adair' was a German ballad. Mdlle. Ormeny had, and we suppose still retains, a magnificent voice for a fog-whistle. Its compass was perfectly surprising. She would shake the chandelier with a wild whoop that made every man instinctively feel for his scalp, and follow it up with a roar that would shame a bassoon."

In the words of Captain Cuttle, "There's solid chunks of wisdom for you." The native refinement of the writer's chaste but vivacious style is equalled only by his acute critical perception. So much talent surely cannot be properly appreciated amongst the Peorientals. The author of the brilliant quotation should no longer bloom like a sweet-briar in a country town, but come to this city and devote his talents to some of the musical weeklies. Success would be certain.—Arcadian.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. ## "SWEET HAWTHORN TIME."

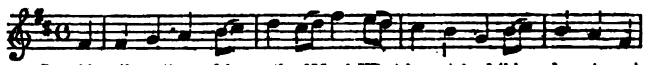
WORDS BY WM. HENDERSON. (SONG.) MUSIC BY EMILE BERGER.



Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May! What joys attend thine advent gay!

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

Price 4s. each.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION (established 1859) (Miss J. Wells, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Coates, Mr. Land, and Mr. Lawler) beg to announce their FIFTEENTH ANNUAL SERIES of THURSDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS, at St. George's Hall, to be given Fortnightly—May 8, 22; June 5 and 19. Subscription stalls, transferable, 21s.; stalls, 6s.; reserved seats, 3s. 6d.; balcony 2s., back, 1s.; of Mr. Land, Director, 4, Cambridge Place, Regent's Park; at Mr. Mitchell's Royal Library, 33, Old Bond Street; and Austin's Ticket Office, 16, Piccadilly.

CHARLES and ARTHUR LE JEUNE, assisted by Mr. C. W. LE JEUNE, will give an EVENING CONCERT, on Tuesday, 13th May, at the Hanover Square Rooms. They will introduce original compositions for Organ and Pianoforte, and their special ORCHESTRAL COMBINATION. This is a charming and unique musical effect, combining the capabilities of each of the key-board instruments, and realising all that can be desired in music—viz., variety of tone, sustained and expressive melody, with elaborate and delicate accompaniment. It is produced by a Harmonium and two lesser instruments; and though not intended to imitate an orchestra, yet it reminds one of the effect by its breadth and brilliancy. Vocalists—Mdlle. Nita Gaetano, Miss Enriquez, and Mr. Santley. Conductor—Mr. W. Ganz. Tickets, 7s., 5s., and 2s. 6d. To be had at Mitchell's Royal Library, Chappell's, Cramer's, Austin's Ticket Office, and at the Rooms.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S RECITALS.—The SECOND RECITAL of PIANOFORTE MUSIC will take place at St. George's Hall, on Tuesday, May 20, at Three o'clock. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea, to be had at St. George's Hall, and of M. Billet, 17, Keppel Street, Russell Square.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From "The Echo.")

The public has lately, through the medium of certain enterprising authors, enjoyed excursions to other worlds than this, some of which have been in the highest degree suggestive of new thoughts and principles to be applied to the circumstances of this work-a-day planet, and some of which served but to amuse an idle hour. We think the present revelations from another world partake in some degree of both these characteristics. The description of the manners and customs of Montalluyah, given by the legislator and ruler of that star, is agreeably written, interesting, and entertaining; and there are further indications of the earnest suggestion, by means of this extra-terrestrial machinery, of sundry improvements in the training of children, in sanitary science, in the art of healing, and in various appliances of social comfort. Perhaps the most interesting of these hints is that conveyed by the account of the "character-divers," or persons chosen to search out the real characters and dispositions of children:—

"I created," says the law-giver of Montalluyah, "the office of 'character-divers,' and selected for the discharge of its duties eminent men of great sagacity and gentleness, skilled in the knowledge of the mind and heart, their sole occupation being to discover the qualities, tendencies, and incipient faults of children, and act accordingly; to dive, as it were, into the secret imaginings of the child; to detect the early germ of evil, and note the presence of good; to indicate measures for eradicating the one and developing the other."

These observing persons are further to ascertain the bent of a child's mind towards any particular pursuit or profession, and in this they seem to have shown more than ordinary acumen, to judge by the following specimen:—

"A man—Zolea by name—who, as a boy, was inattentive to his studies, while his talent for sketching from nature was so remarkable that even during school hours, with his eye seemingly on his book, he would occupy himself in sketching those around him. Everyone, except the character-divers, thought that nature intended this boy as a great artist. These demonstrated that as an artist he would never obtain a high position; and, after observing how he occupied himself in play hours, and subjecting him to numerous tests, so completely cured him of his want of application and other defects that he became the wisest and greatest of our kings."

This little apologue is so full of thought that the pretty description of the Star City which immediately follows suffers by comparison.

It is a little difficult with regard to some of the customs described to ascertain whether the author's object in inventing them was to satirize our own or simply to amuse his readers. On the interesting subject of the position and capabilities of women, for instance, he has little to suggest, unless it is that they should have more elaborate costumes, more comfortable arm-chairs, and be generally more beautiful than they are. Regarding this last topic we have one serious remark to make. So far as beauty can be the result of attention to health, and of the practice of all those virtues which react on the body, a sage such as the legislator of Montalluyah is justified in attaching great value to it; but the worship of beauty per se requires rather repression than encouragement. It is the cruelest of all caste idolatries; and one of the features of materialism which renders that explanation of things most dangerous to human happiness is its tendency to produce too high an estimate of physical beauty and strength, gifts which never have been, and probably never can be, enjoyed by all human beings in equal proportion. The sage is, however, keenly alive to the mischief of two unamiable tendencies of a nature similar to this undue exaltation of prosperous physical conditions, the neglect and impatience of the two extremes of human life—infancy and old age. These he endeavours to raise in public estimation by various enactments.

The interest of some passages in this work would certainly be enhanced if it were rather easier to understand what the author expects his readers to think of them. This is particularly the case with regard to the "Song of Admiration," and the subsequent comments upon it. The song is supposed to be addressed by a lover to his mistress, and can only be accounted for, as it appears to us, by the fact mentioned by the sage, "in this connection," that the pulsation of the Montalluyans is more rapid than ours. The same sort of ambiguity pervades the numerous proposals of ways and means of rendering life comfortable. They seem scarcely extravagant enough for the purpose of satire, and scarcely practical enough to be really valuable. The author's display of science on all these subjects appears not hazy enough for jest, yet too hazy for sober earnest. Electricity, for instance, plays a great part in the various inventions he describes as rendering the Montalluyans happy: but the mode of action ascribed to it would make electricians stare. To anybody, however, who is not too learned in the ways of this subtle agent, and they are probably many, "Another World" can be safely recommended as sure to afford them amusement combined with no little instruction.

INAUGURATION AT THE RHENISH CONSERVATORY, COLOGNE.

The alterations in the house purchased for the Rhenish Conservatory, and situated in the Wolfsstrasse, Cologne, having been completed, the proper officials were enabled formally to inaugurate it on the 18th April. Invitations for the ceremony were issued to, and accepted by, an audience as select as it was numerous, including the principal Royal and municipal authorities, and the very many lovers of music in the town. The ceremony began with a "Festmarsch," for pianoforte (for four hands), by the director, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, Capellmeister. It was played by Mdlles. L. Kruse and Neumegen. At its termination, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller read the following "introductory words," which we give in extenso:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—The where in which, materially speaking, we pass our lives, is, we all know, of the very greatest importance. We dare scarcely speak any longer now-a-days of our corporeal envelope as the dwelling-place of the soul; but however this may be in a physiological sense, in that of appearance and happiness, this residential question is perhaps weightier than any other. 'Fine feathers make fine birds,' people say. We almost feel inclined to believe it, when we see the efforts to glorify the most intimate residences of our individuality. Our country, province, town, and village, inhabited by large and small communities, constitute the first basis of our well-being. From the hut of the day labourer to the palace of the prince, what a series is there of the most various phenomena, announcing the wants and pretensions of the inmates. From the workshop of the mechanic to the temples dedicated to art, poetry, and to the Godhead itself, what richness of invention and energy to satisfy, as regards space, the highest thoughts and views as well as the first necessities of mankind! It is not surprising, then, that we approach with the greatest seriousness the erection, choice, or alteration of any edifice, no matter for what purpose it is intended. So much is involved. A building must be not only fitted for the occupation to be carried on in it; it must exercise an influence which shall advance that occupation. The influence we can require from it I may call a freedom-giving influence in the very best acceptation of the words—freeing us from every impediment in the way of our life-utterances; supplying free breath to the free mind. It is not, therefore, without a certain degree of solemnity that we have assembled here to-day to consecrate the place which has been devoted to the beautiful art of tone, and to its disciples. Works of great masters are to be performed here, and fresh forces are to be trained for the purpose—yes, if possible, new masters shall issue from this school and join the ranks of those who have by their efforts enriched the world with so much happiness and so much joy. From those who come to learn, there shall spring teachers, to spread in ever and ever enlarging circles the comprehension, the practice, and the love of our art. The endlessly varied germs which Nature scatters with reckless indifference will here be fostered with that affectionate assiduity, without which we can hope neither for blossom nor fruit. Never, probably, was there a time when the numbers seeking in music the means of livelihood were so great as at present. Fortunately, the culture of their widely-spread creed furnishes abundant materials for remunerative industry; for it requires the most various workers to satisfy the multitudes of devotees flocking to them for artistic edification. How closely is it interwoven with life, from the smallest family circle, through the joy and sufferings of human destiny, to the revelations of genius addressed to thousands! So absorbing is it, too, that it willingly employs the smallest resources, while the highest do not suffice. Schiller's magnificent words: 'Strive ever towards the Whole! if thou canst thyself not become a Whole, cling to a Whole as a useful member,' find in the practice of no other art so satisfactory an application as in that of ours. The architect, when erecting his monuments which are to last for centuries, requires zealous and active workmen—but the architect of the airy edifices of tone requires inwardly elevated and enthusiastic assistants. Now enthusiasm resembles a good action; it rewards no one more highly than him from whom it springs. True, enthusiasm is not all that is needed, and we cannot cry too loudly to those who would devote themselves to music, that their object is not so very easy of attainment. Our art demands the most unconditional devotion; heart and hand, understanding and mind; it claims the entire man. Above all, it requires high courage—for we must combat—combat to the end—with ourselves and with others—with our own nature and with circumstances. What perseverance does not the professional disciple require before he succeeds, even partially, in making the organs he needs serve him? The very feeling for music revolts against exercises which are repugnant to it, but without which it is totally incapable of ever commanding appreciation. On the one hand, there is the danger of doing too little to achieve the end in view, and, on the other, of sinking to what should be merely the means. What we are accustomed to call the struggle between matter and mind is, perhaps, nowhere more strikingly apparent than in the work demanded from the arm and the hand, the lungs and the throat, to render them capable of re-producing the picture drawn by the mind.—The training through which the tone-poet has to pass to make sure of the mastery over the creatures of his fancy is less repugnant, but not less strict. Here the struggle lies between the freedom which willingly and readily bows to the laws of reason, and the freedom which is more the product of unbridled impulse than of any clear views. However such views in this case, as in others, may be evolved in natural succession, no one will ever be able to create anything really endowed with life, who has not worked and struggled in the sweat of his brow, though the best of what he does is, and always will be, the gift of a beneficent Divinity.—To all this is to be added the struggle for the common necessities of life, the struggle for existence in the most limited acceptation of the word. Millions have to go through this struggle—but few with the inward conflict which supervenes but too easily in the case of the musician. As a general rule, badly remunerated and but little honoured, thousands of us find that the question is whether in our nerve-consuming exertions we can preserve strength enough to serve the one God, or whether we shall worship the golden calf. Let us pay the deepest respect to those who pursue the first course, and, as on many others, pass a mild sentence on those who follow the second, for their task sometimes goes beyond what it is possible for man to bear. It is vouchsafed only to a few, endowed with more than usually high gifts, to devote themselves exclusively to the ideal branches of art. They appear in their fullest individuality before the public—and the hardest struggle begins. It is here that a musician must display genuine artistic courage—courage not less than that of the statesman and of the soldier—he must, according to the words of the poet, stake his life in order to gain it. He must possess truthful conviction without self-boasting—endurance on bad as well as on good days—integrity and honesty in what he does, and in the way he endeavours to cause it to be appreciated—contempt for vain tinsel with the joy at success. A musician must not estimate too highly the sympathies of the great masses, nor must he undervalue them—he must not allow himself to be bowed down by vulgarity, when it approaches him, nor by arrogance, when it looks down upon him. In a word, a musician must be a man who does his best and leaves the rest to higher powers. This is easily said—but accomplished only with difficulty, for the question involves a man's dearest possession—his most inward individuality and his belief therein. What now can the school do to fit out its scholars for the journey through life? Not so much as it could wish; not so much, perhaps—we must confess—as it ought. 'Talent is developed in stillness, and character in the stream of the world.' We can, therefore, carefully labour to educate the former, and. in by far the majority of cases, leave it to the future to bring what a higher inspiration alone can give. But it must not be supposed that there is any lack of due preparation. We require from the scholar earnestness, diligence, patience, and perseverance—all admirable agents of discipline. We require obedience to the law—modesty—respect for what is great and beautiful, with which we endeavour to make him acquainted, and which we endeavour to render clear to him. But, above all things, it is our duty to help him to attain to as high a degree as possible of what I must term professional excellence—for it is only when his efforts rest upon this foundation that they can prove profitable to himself and others. Nothing is more injurious, in art as in life, than a superficial dealing with so-called ideas, without a vigorous substratum of real skill, real knowledge, and real ability. I turn, therefore, to my honoured colleagues with the request—assuredly superfluous though it be—that they will continue those exertions which they have hitherto made with so much pains and love, with so much judgment and talent, and that they will not allow themselves to be discouraged if the results do not always correspond to their wishes. If, on the one hand, great natural gifts are always exceptional, when in the youth and the insufficient preparatory training of so many pupils there exists such numerous obstacles, which are sometimes not to be overcome by the most energetic tutorship, the many admirable results already obtained must, on the other hand, be a source of profound satisfaction to you; while you must be strengthened by the consideration that even the smallest veins are necessary for the circulation of the blood, and that you can testify to having in every case produced good blood. But what beneficial results have already been effected by our school will be evident not only to all unprejudiced observers in this town and province—in far distant cities, and lands you will have opportunities of contemplating the happy signs of the influence exerted by your pupils. I must, above all things, congratulate both those pupils who are present and those who are absent, on our having been enabled to open for them this locality, in which there is nothing to limit the numbers of the aspirants, or of the lessons to be given them. May the students become more and more penetrated with the conviction that it entirely depends upon themselves, in proportion to their abilities, to attain to something worthy of respect in their art. To effect this, it is, above all things, necessary that their studies should not creep along side by side with their life but that they should sway it. The poet calls life serious, and art cheerful. Yet, at your years, life is cheerful, but art must be something serious for you, now and evermore. And the more serious it is and shall be to you, the more joyous will you be able to render it for those who enjoy it—for the Olympian merriment of which the poet speaks exists only where all the trouble of artistic labour is either completely absent, or, at least, altogether concealed. You, the friends and patrons of our efforts, who are assembled here, I greet with thanks and pleasant emotion. For a long series of years, you have remained faithful to us, and not ceased to distribute that chinking aliment without which even intellectual life could not exist. We do not fear that this state of things will cease, but we beg you to bestow upon our efforts and their results a little more of that personal interest which exerts so refreshing, so encouraging, and so vivifying an effect wherever it is displayed. There are, probably, few things in which the fact of watching the progress of gifted scholars is combined with so much satisfaction as in the art of practical music. What is wanting, what is added, what at last is achieved—all is observed with equal interest—we hear it growing. Give us, in addition to your other favours, a few hours in the evening during the winter—we shall regard your presence as a precious and honourable present, and take care you shall have no reason to regret having made it. We think we cannot better consecrate these stately precincts than by presenting to you a series of productions by those masters whom we respect and love above all others, and with whose works we consider it our artistic duty to form and embue the taste of our scholars. However various may be the individualities of these great men, they all satisfy, even though in different degrees, the highest demands made upon art. The productions of their fancy are rich and healthy—organically raised upon the soil of their fertile soul. These works do not owe their existence to sophistic intellect or to witty combination; they are the honest, true, and simple expression of their authors' individuality—full and rich in themselves, not showily tricked out to conceal their poverty. The same clear and logical language is spoken by all these masters, however peculiar the purport of what they say. They degenerate neither into affected, over-excited excess of feeling, nor into vulgar frivolity. They rule their art: but as wise monarchs, not as capriciously licentious despots. They pay homage to beauty, and 'in the very torrent and tempest, and, as I may say, the whirlwind of passion,' fill our ear with harmony, despising those pungent incitements, which irritate the nerves without penetrating to the soul. They offer the youngest mind the most wholesome and the most agreeable nourishment—and to the end of life fill every true musician with deep respect, admiration, and love. Their collected works form the Gospel of Musical Art.

"I cannot leave this place, without addressing a few words to those respected men who, constituting our committee, have assumed, in a way as unselfish as it is useful, the management of the Conservatory. In my own name, and in that of my colleagues, I thank them most warmly for their fostering care. A better reward than can be conveyed in my poor words they will find in all the good that has sprung from this young musical nursery. Having touched upon the pedagogical points of the subject, I will here merely direct attention to the fact that, thanks to the establishment of our school, a body of distinguished musicians, whose efforts benefit general musical education, has been gained for the town, and point to the numbers of assiduous young persons, of both sexes, who have succeeded, by the instruction they enjoyed here, in gaining an honourable and assured position. We will hope, then, that our Cologne Conservatory may, for a long series of years, continue to flourish and gain more and more in importance, and we feel pleased to think that our distant descendants may, many years hence, retain a thankful recollection of the founders and patrons of this institution."

This address was received with much interest. It was followed by the inaugural concert, in which were performed works by J. S. Bach, G. F. Handel, J. Haydn, W. A. Mozart, L. van Beethoven, C. M. von Weber, Fr. Schubert, F. Mendelssohn, and R. Schumann. As regards the execution, it is sufficient to state that it was undertaken by our most eminent artists (Herren F. Hiller, Schneider, Marktke, von Königslöw, Rensberg, Jensen, Gernsheim, J. Seiss, Hülle, and Hompesch), who were much applauded. With regard to the distribution of the building, according to the plans, and under the personal superintendence of the architect, Herr J. Felten, we must mention especially the fine grand hall on the ground floor. This hall, when brilliantly lighted up, presents, with its stately proportions and convenient arrangements, a magnificent appearance; nothing better could possibly have been produced with the available resources. On the west and south sides are eight circular niches containing busts. The latter represent the Emperor and King, Wilhelm, and the great German composers, Bach, Beethoven, Handel, Gluck, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and C. M. von Weber. According to the opinion of competent judges, the acoustic properties of the hall are admirable. Besides this grand hall, intended for concerts and festive ceremonies, the building contains a refreshment room, and more than twenty other apartments, used as the library, residence of the librarian, and lodgings for pupils.

We conclude our account by a most hearty wish that the hope expressed by Dr. Hiller at the close of his address may be happily fulfilled.—Kölnische Zeitung.

A NEW LYRIC STAR.

This sidereal phenomenon appears to have risen above the operatic horizon, at Milan, in the person of Mdlle. Valleria, who, like the heroine of the now forgotten ballad: "Sweet Rose of Lucerne," can exclaim—

"I've come across the sea, I've brav'd ev'ry danger."

—for she hails from the other side of the Atlantic—"to cull no end of laurels in the land of song, Italy itself." She has been singing during the present season, and the Italian press is highly complimentary in reference to her. Il Sole, for instance, says of her, in Un Ballo in Maschera:—

"Signorina Valleria was brilliant, sprightly, and exceedingly sympathetic in the part—all grace, dash, and perfume—of the Page. We cordially congratulate not only the young artist, who promises so well, but also the maestro Arditi, who instructed her in Italian singing."

A second paper observes:—

"Signora Valleria is a sprightly, sympathetic young Page, and proved she could wear male attire most becomingly and easily. She sang with grace and elegance, being greatly applauded, especially in the ballad, which she gave with spirit, vivacity, and exquisite taste."

The Rivista backs this up as follows:—

"We were again present at a performance of Robert le Diable, on the 26th, and are more than ever convinced that, ere long, Mdlle. Valleria will become one of our most brilliant operatic stars. We heard, in the character of Isabella, the celebrated Madame La Grange, a perfect phenomenon in art, and we confess that in Mdlle. Valleria we trace no small resemblance to that grand artist. If we except certain ineffective fioriture, everything done by Mdlle. Valleria met with universal approbation, and every evening she sings she is greeted with unanimous and loud applause in her romances, especially the second: 'Robert, toi que j'aime.' Forward, then Mademoiselle; you have the Future before you, and glory awaits you in every theatre."

Another paper discourses of her thus:—

"Mdlle. Valleria has ended by becoming the enfant chérie of the public, from whom she receives enthusiastic ovations both as Isabella in Robert le Diable, and as Oscar in Un Ballo in Maschera."

Here is another specimen:—

"The Signorina Valleria was extremely good in the part of Oscar. She is a young Page who sings with good taste, and is all dash and smiles, perfectly at home on the stage, constantly moving, roguish, and self-assured. She was greatly applauded, and we feel sure she would have done even much more in a more sympathetic part."

The Gazzetta dei Teatri observes:—

"Signorina Valleria, a graceful daughter of America, who has visited our beautiful country for the purpose of forming herself in the Italian musical style, made her first appearance as Isabella. She possesses a real soprano, limpid, most flexible, and sympathetic, which pleasingly fills the vast building. Though applauded in certain parts on the first evening, she could not do full justice to her powers, on account of the agitation incident to such an occasion. But, on the second evening, being calmer and, consequently, more self-possessed, she spared us certain poetical licences of execution that had nothing to do with the music; thus enabling the public better to admire her talent and applaud her ability. If she only continue to study zealously, Mdlle, Valleria is destined to attain to the highest honours; of this there is no doubt."

The same paper in a subsequent number, remarks:—

"Mdlle. Valleria has gained the sympathies of everyone, and is warmly applauded, both in Robert le Diable and Un Ballo in Maschera."

The Fama is no less laudatory:—

"Signorina Valleria is a most sympathetic Oscar, possessing, as she does, a fine voice and great intelligence. In her ballads she displays all her extraordinary talent, all her grace, and all the marvellous compass of her register. The applause was general and spontaneous."

Il Corriere Milanese pays tribute in these words:—

"The graceful Mdlle. Valleria, with her elegant modulations and soft gentle organ, has gradually obtained the sympathy of the public, and is rewarded with general applause."

The Eco dei Teatri contributes in these terms to the budget of praise:—

"But the person who surprised the public was Signora Valleria, a handsome young Page, with a limpid voice and a degree of stage tact quite American. She was greatly applauded."

Then comes Il Secolo with:—

"On the first evening we could admire only Signora Alvina Valleria's genuine soprano, ringing, fresh, and flexible; for the nervousness incident to a début prevented her from feeling sufficiently calm to give correctly the music, or to do justice to the character of the Queen. Even then, however, applause was not wanting, especially for the romance in the fourth act. Subsequently the applause has become warmer and more general, for the young lady's voice has gained more certainty of execution, while the charm of her very prepossessing personal appearance has been enhanced by the greater ease of her movements and bearing. Signora Valleria has still no little to do, both as an actress and a singer, before she can reach the position to which she aspires; but with her splendid organ, if she will only back it up by hard work, the future cannot be doubtful.

The following is even more flattering:—

"We now come to the Page, Oscar, to that interesting and valiant young artist, Mdlle. Alvina Valleria. We expected a model Oscar from her, and our expectations were not disappointed. All she uttered she uttered with certainty, spirit, dash, and soul, singing the ballads especially well, and in them surpassing all the ladies who had previously sustained the part. With a homogeneous, ringing voice, of marvellous compass; with intelligence of a high order; with a method imparted by Signor Arditi; and with a graceful and prepossessing personal appearance, she had no reason to fear any comparisons, and she underwent the test triumphantly, so that we, too, applauding vigorously, cry out: Brava!"

Lines for Music.

IN ENGLAND I WAS BORN.*

The land where I was born
No wondrous charms can boast,
Wave wash'd and tempest torn,
A cold and rocky coast;
Yet, though so bleak her shores,
Here verdant meads abound,
Where teeming Nature pours
Rich blessings all around.
Who will may mock and scorn,
Right well content am I;
In England I was born,
In England let me die!

In other climes the flowers,
'Tis said, are rare and bright,
The paler bloom of ours
Gives to my soul delight.
I care not for the plain
Where gem and gold may be,
Our fields of ripened grain
Are good enough for me.
Who will may mock, &c.

Here first my sire drew breath,
Here passed his life away,
Here met his sires their death,
Here sleep in English clay;
Like them I make my choice,
And trust when Death is near,
To find an English voice
The last sound I shall hear.
Who will may mock, &c.

An Unpublished Ballet by Mozart (1778).*

Whatever we may think of this scenarium, it is certain that the ballet achieved a great success, as shown even by the laudatory tone of the anonymous critic, who is by no means always so gentle. No less favourable is the testimony of Baron Grimm (Corr. lit., x., p. 53), though he now and then intersperses his approbation with a critical gloss. "We must not omit to state that the last scene always provokes simultaneously with the applause a murmur of disapprobation—a proof that the feeling of propriety still exerts stern sway on our stage. We refer to the moment when the supposed shepherd dispels the error of the two shepherdesses who are competing for his love by baring his bosom. Great as is the grace and discretion with which Mademoiselle Asselin represents this scene, as well as every thing else, her pantomime always finds the audience divided, and those who cry out: da capo, are not able to suppress the marks of disapprobation."

Thus much Grimm, in whose words is mirrored all the simplicity of the year 1778. With regard to the music, neither Grimm nor the Journal de Paris says anything about it, and, probably, no one paid any attention to it. This is not astonishing, for in this branch of art, where the charm of sight outweighs disproportionably that of hearing, those concerned were satisfied with botching up the music pot-pourri fashion, giving the preference to folk-like songs and fashionable airs. The words of these compositions, which involuntarily suggested themselves to the memory of the audience, helped to render the scenic action more intelligible than it otherwise would have been; these productions were called: airs parlants.

Under the circumstances, how could the public know that they were listening to a musical masterpiece? As at the present day, so at that period, also, the majority of musical amateurs required to have their attention excited by the name of a well-known composer, as we are told in the satirical lines:—

> "Et vous, gens de l'art,
> Pour que je jouisse
> Quand c'est du Mozart,
> Que l'on m'avertisse"—

and, in this case, their attention had not been excited. Noverre had taken care that his collaborator should not be named, and Mozart, for fear of exasperating his patron, wisely held his tongue. Moreover, the music of Les petits Riens would probably have produced no other impression even had the composer been mentioned; for who in France then knew the glorious name of Mozart? Even those who remembered the once phenomenal child, from his former stay in Paris,—not excepting Noverre himself—could scarcely suspect the real importance of the young composer. Yet this composition, the authorship of which Mozart renounced with careless magnanimity, deserved the most attentive consideration; for though we can by no means apply to light and gaily conceived music like this the same standard as to such works as Don Juan and Figaro, Les petits Riens must still be described as, in its kind, worthy the immortal master. Mozart's desire to show himself in the most favourable light to his patron, Noverre, must have stimulated him to put forth his whole strength, even when not concealing from himself that his name would hardly on this occasion force its way to the public. Besides, the creative power of the young composer was, at that epoch especially, so rich and flowing, that he had merely to give his pen full scope, and captivating and original ideas were sure to flow abundantly upon the paper.

With regard to the whole affair, which does not characterize in a very favourable light musical matters in Paris at that period, as well as to the share which Mozart had in Noverre's ballet, we have sufficient information in the master's correspondence quoted by Otto Jahn (Letter to his Father of the 9th July). A certain want of clearness in the expressions: "Six pieces in it will be by others," and "altogether I shall have written twelve pieces for it," appears to be caused by the fact that, when writing to his father, Mozart made the extent of his work as small as possible, for his father had often warned him never to compose anything without a corresponding material recompense; he considered he had the right of committing a trifling inaccuracy, in consideration of the slight importance of two numbers, which together made only twenty-four bars. Thus fourteen of the numbers in the ballet may be set down as written by Mozart; the six others are called by him in the letter already mentioned: "miserable French ariettas."

We will now proceed to the consideration of the score itself. It is written in a delicate and careful hand. The overture, for two violins, tenor, two flutes, two oboes, two clarionets, two horns, two trumpets, two bassoons, kettle-drums, and a double-bass, in one tempo, and extending to 106 bars, is quite in Mozart's style, and full of the most charming details. We can discover almost note for note certain Mozartean forms of expression; to quote, for instance, the words of Susanne, in Le Nozze di Figaro, "Sembra fatto in ver per me."

No. 1 of the fourteen numbers, left after deducting the six not Mozart's, is a Largo con sordini, C major, two-four time, for stringed quartet, two flutes, and two oboes. It is thirty-five bars long, and is interrupted by a short Presto, after which the powerful motive re-appears.

No. 2. No tempo given.—Two-four time.—A minor, stringed quartet—eighteen bars—song-form.

No. 3. Andantino. $\frac{2}{4}$—C major—eighteen bars. The instrumentation is limited to two violins, and two flutes, which reply, echo-like, to each other, most probably to correspond with the movements in the game of Blind-Man's-Buff.

No. 4. Allegro—$\frac{6}{8}$—C major—six bars—a very short melodram, marking, in all probability, the moment when the Blind Man catches some one.

No. 5. Larghetto—$\frac{3}{4}$—F major—sixteen bars for solo oboe, stringed quartet, and two horns.

No. 6. Allegro-Gavotte—$\frac{2}{4}$—F major—sixty-four bars—for stringed quartet, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons.

No. 7. Adagio—$\frac{2}{4}$—D major—twelve bars—stringed quartet and two flutes.

No. 8. No tempo given—$\frac{6}{8}$—D major—thirty-six bars—stringed quartet, two flutes, two oboes, and two horns. Precisely of a similar character to the piece from Martini's Cosa rara, and that from Sarti's Due Litiganti, introduced by Mozart in the second finale of Don Juan.

No. 9. No tempo given—Gavotte gracieuse—$\frac{2}{4}$—twenty-seven bars—stringed quartet and two oboes.

No. 10. No tempo given—Pantomine—$\frac{3}{4}$—A major—twenty-six bars—stringed quartet.

No. 11. Passepied—$\frac{3}{8}$—D major—sixteen bars—stringed quartet. The first four bars of this piece are exactly the same as those of the second movement in the first of the "Six Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violin." ("Dédiées à la Princesse Palatine.") This work, like the ballet, was composed in the year 1778, and first engraved from the MS. in Paris.

No. 12. No tempo given—Gavotte—$\frac{2}{4}$—B flat major—fifteen bars—stringed quartet.

No. 13. Andante—$\frac{3}{4}$—B flat major—sixteen bars—stringed quartet and two oboes.

No. 14. No tempo given—Gigue—$\frac{6}{8}$—E major—sixty-four bars—stringed quartet, two flutes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons.

The second performance of Les Petits Riens did not come off till the 20th June, its fate being naturally connected with that of Piccini's opera, the only moderate success of which delayed its repetition. The Journal de Paris of the 15th June explains this delay in the following words: "Fochetti, the barytone who has just arrived, sustained the part of Marescial, instead of Signora Farnesi, who took it merely to oblige." But the fact of replacing a soprano by a barytone appears at first blush rather hazardous; and, as it turned out, Signor Fochetti did not achieve a greater success than his fair predecessor; at the third performance—on the 25th June—he was in his turn replaced by Signor Tozzoni.

Finally, after the fourth performance—on the 2nd July—Le finte Gemelle disappeared from the bills, but the ballet, rescued from shipwreck, was presented, newly arranged, to the public on 13th August. The Journal de Paris, for the 14th August, 1778.

observes on the occasion: "The ballet, Les Petits Riens, by Noverre, was again seen with pleasure; it was executed with the intelligence and skill to which we are accustomed in the representatives of the principal parts: MM. d'Auberval, Vestris, Jun., Mesdles. Guimard, Allard, and Asselin." Thus it was the fate of this charming music from the pen of the greatest composer of any epoch to disappear unrecognized in the sea of oblivion, after affording, for a short time, only superficial and sensual pleasure to a merely sight-loving multitude. It was not till the year 1856 that an article by Edouard Fournier, in the Revue française, once more directed public attention to Mozart's presence in Paris, and his relations with Noverre. But, strange to say, it never struck either the writer of the article or any one of his readers to institute a search for the lost score. It is true that Fournier had got upon a false scent, as he supposed that it was for another of Noverre's ballets, namely, Annette et Lubin, that Mozart composed the music. As, however, the first performance of Annette et Lubin did not take place till the 9th July, 1778, that cannot possibly be the ballet to the "fourth performance" of which Mozart refers in his letter, also of the 9th July, to his father. It was, no doubt, written in the book of fate that, like the Sleeping Beauty, the score of Les Petits Riens should slumber for nearly a century in the dust of a library; that ninety-five years should elapse before it was discovered, and its real author restored to his rights.

MACREADY.

Mr. William Charles Macready, the eminent actor, died on Sunday at his residence, 6, Wellington Square, Cheltenham, where he had lived in retirement for several years. Mr. Macready was born in London on the 3rd of March, 1793, and received his education at Rugby. Whilst he was preparing himself at Oxford, his father, who was the manager and lessee of several provincial theatres, became deeply embarrassed in his affairs, and young Macready resolved to adopt the profession. He made his first appearance in Birmingham, in June, 1810, in the character of Romeo, and met with a very gratifying reception. He remained with his father's company until 1814, when he visited Ireland and Scotland. On the 6th of September, 1816, he appeared at Covent Garden, as Orestes, in The Distressed Mother; and Edmund Kean, with other eminent actors who witnessed his début on the London stage, entertained the highest opinion of his abilities. He subsequently removed to Drury Lane, where he became the original representative of the heroes in Sheridan Knowles's William Tell, Virginius, and Caius Gracchus. In 1826 he paid his first visit to the United States, and in 1828 he visited Paris, where he was enthusiastically received. He revisited the United States in 1843-4, and again in 1849, on which occasion the jealousy of Mr. Forrest, the actor, led to a desperate riot at the Astor Operahouse, at New York, in which Macready was performing, when he was attacked by the mob, and with difficulty escaped with his life. The military were called out to suppress the disturbance, and having fired killed twenty-two men on the spot, besides wounding several others. On his return to England, shortly afterwards, in the autumn of 1849, Macready commenced his final engagement at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, the completion of which he was obliged to relinquish, on account of ill-health, but resumed it in the autumn of 1850, and brought it to a conclusion Feb. 3, 1851. His benefit took place at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, Feb. 26, and the "Macready Banquet" was celebrated soon afterwards. He retired to Sherborne, Dorsetshire, whence he removed to Cheltenham on his second marriage, occupying himself chiefly with schemes for the education of the poorer classes. The late Lord Lytton's Richelieu and Lady of Lyons, together with other famous plays, were written expressly for Macready—who, nevertheless, above all, excelled as a Shakesperian actor, as those who have witnessed, among other things, his magnificent impersonations of King Lear, Macbeth, King John, and Othello, must well remember. He was one of the most consummate and variously-accomplished dramatic artists of his period.

ERFURT.—The last concert of Soller's Musical Union was highly interesting, and went off exceedingly well, under the direction of the energetic conductor, Herr A. Golde. The programme included Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, and the overture to Tannhäuser by Herr Richard Wagner. Mdlle. Minna Nanitz, from the Royal Opera, Dresden, sang the air: "Ach, ich habe sie verloren," from Gluck's Orpheus; an air from La Cenerentola, and songs by Radecke and Dessauer. Herr Lauterbach, also from Dresden, gave Spohr's "Concert in Form einer Gesangscene," a "Moderato and Scherzo" of his own, and a Cavatina by Raff. Both the visitors were much applauded.

AUGUSTUS HARRIS.

(From the "Liverpool Porcupine.")

During the last twenty years, few persons connected with operatic and theatrical matters have been more universally known and more warmly appreciated in London and other European capitals than Mr. Augustus Harris—familiarly known as "Gus"—the stage-manager of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, who died quite unexpectedly last Saturday, at his house in London. The writer of this was only speaking to Mr. Harris about a week before he was shocked by reading the news of his death. He met the deceased gentleman at a well-known resort of metropolitan professional and literary men, and, amongst the brilliant company gathered on that occasion at the "Albion," none appeared in better health and spirits than the lieutenant of Mr. Gye.

Mr. Harris may almost be said to have been born in an opera-house, for he first saw the light at Naples when the San Carlo Opera was the most brilliant and famous in Europe. His mother, Madame Fearon, was a prima donna styled the "English Catalani," and well-known in both Continental and English opera-houses. We do not know anything about Mr. Harris's youth, but from an early age he was connected with the London theatres, both as an author and actor, and in the latter capacity he was a worthy rival of Mr. Morris Barnett in such characters as Monsieur Jacques, for which his Continental education and experience, and his rare powers as a linguist, eminently fitted him. Mr. Harris subsequently became manager of the Princess's Theatre, where he introduced Mr. Fetcher to the English stage; but he eventually retired from management, and attached himself to the fortunes of Mr. Gye at Covent Garden, as stage-manager. In this capacity, Mr. Harris—who superintended the "mounting" and rehearsing of the magnificent spectacles which have made the Royal Italian Opera world-famous—proved himself to be an artist in every sense of the word. Dresses, scenery, and appointments were, under his direction, miracles of brilliant and tasteful colouring; while the chorus and ballet, instead of being inanimate spectators of the loves and hates of the vocalists, were taught to act themselves, and so to add to the completeness of the ensemble. Unlike most stage-managers, Mr. Harris was not content to stand at the side-wings and "shriek" his orders, but he went on the stage as a peasant, fisherman, or soldier, and personally set the chorus and "supers" the example of that active attention to their duties which made representations of such operas as Les Huguenots, Masaniello, Le Prophète, L'Etoile du Nord, &c., vivid, exciting, and life-like to a degree never previously witnessed on the stage.

Mr. Harris was not only a wonderful stage-manager, but an admirable judge of lyric vocalism. During the recess he was always on the wing through Europe, in search of novelty, and it was very rare for his own unaided judgment to be at fault. In addition to this rare gift, he was complete master of that delicate diplomatic tact so essential in dealing with the sensitive beings who pass their lives on operatic boards. In the numerous difficulties inseparable from the management of a vast concern such as the Royal Italian Opera, Mr. Harris's tact was constantly called into play; and, while he was a universal favourite with all the greatest artists of the day, no man ever served a master with more devotion than he did Mr. Gye.

It speaks volumes for Mr. Harris's unique talents and suavity of disposition, that he was the trusted friend and confidant of Mr. Gye, and of Mr. John Knowles, of the Theatre Royal, Manchester—a fact which can be best appreciated by those acquainted with the inner secrets of theatrical life. Both these gentlemen have now to mourn an irreparable loss; and their regrets will be more acutely shared by a loving family who have been suddenly bereft of an affectionate head; while in the wider circles of art and literature the memory of "Gus Harris" will long be held green.

REGENSBURG.—A concert has been given by the Richard Wagner Association under the direction of Count Eduard du Moulin. The programme included Overture and "Gruss an die Halle," from Tannhäuser; Elsa's Dream, and third scene of Act 1 from Lohengrin; Spinning Song and Ballad from Der fliegende Holländer; and concluding scene from the Meistersinger.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The 27th and last of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts, as genuine amateurs understand them, brought together an enormous audience on Saturday afternoon. In accordance with long custom, it was for the "benefit" of Mr. Manns, the conductor, who, in companionship with Mr. George Grove, has worked with such zeal and indefatigable perseverance to raise these performances up to the point of almost unrivalled excellence, now, and indeed for a long time, unanimously recognized among the world of music-lovers. The programme, as usual, on these particular occasions, just as when the last concert of the season is for the "benefit" of the Director of the Monday Popular Concerts, was of a more miscellaneous character than is the general rule. Nevertheless, it was rich in interest purely musical. The overture to Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, descriptive of stormy weather in the mountains, and the opening chorus ("Uebergang zum Frühling"), illustrating the approach of spring, opened the concert famously. Then we had the two movements belonging to Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, the rescue of which from what might have been permanent oblivion is due to Mr. Grove and the Directors of the Crystal Palace, who commissioned him to undertake a journey a few years since, to which we are indebted for an acquaintance with more of Schubert at his best than, but for the opportunity thus afforded, we should ever have been likely to make. The third and last purely orchestral piece was the overture to Tannhäuser, to which every true believer in Wagner, "the prophet," instinctively bows. Here was sufficient variety; and, as all was admirably executed, all produced its legitimate effect. In addition to the orchestral displays, the violin and pianoforte were conspicuous—in the hands, moreover, of two of the most accomplished professors, Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé. The lady selected one of the justly-renowned fantasias of Heinrich Ernst, including the march and "Willow Song" from Rossini's Otello; the gentleman took the pianoforte in Beethoven's Choral Fantasia—Madame Otto-Alvsleben, Misses Bessie Goode and Annie Butterworth, Messrs. Guy, Wadmore, and H. A. Pope being entrusted with the vocal parts which, as in the Ninth Symphony, are important auxiliaries to the final movement. How Madame Néruda gave the Fantasia of Ernst need no more be told than how Mr. Hallé rendered the solos in the Choral Fantasia. Both acquitted themselves in perfection, and were appreciated accordingly; nor were the compositions in which they assisted by any means the least attractive features of the entertainment. The vocal music was selected judiciously, with a view to contrast and variety. Mdlle. Ostava Torriani (from Her Majesty's Opera) sang "O luce di quest' anima," and the cavatina from Linda di Chamouni, also joining Signor Agnesi in "La dove prende," the familiar duet from Mozart's Flauto Magico. Signor Agnesi gave the well-worn "Sorgete," from Rossini's Maometto Secondo (afterwards enlarged into Le Siège de Corinthe, for Paris)—an air, times gone by, made famous chiefly through the singing of Tamburini, and which has a florid cabaletta exactly suited to Signor Agnesi's means and style of vocalization. That every one in the concert-room was delighted to hear Mr. Sims Reeves, after his long illness, appeared plainly in the enthusiastic greeting he received. Nothing better could have been selected for our great tenor than the pathetic recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the exquisitely tuneful air, "Waft her, angels," with which Mr. Reeves (like the elder Braham before him) invariably associates it. In Mariani's canzonet, "Una Rosa," and Mendelssohn's characteristic "Hunting Song," Mr. Reeves was accompanied by Mr. Hallé—a graceful compliment from one distinguished artist to another, and the more acceptable in this instance as dispensing with a recent by no means laudable custom of preparing orchestral accompaniments for songs intended expressly by the composer to be accompanied on the pianoforte. The other noticeable vocal performance was "Gli angui d'inferno"—the second song of the Queen of Night in Il Flauto Magico—declaimed with remarkable spirit by Madame Otto Alvsleben, who showed herself a thorough mistress of the trying and difficult passages composed by Mozart for an exceptional voice (that of his sister-in-law, Madame Hofer).

The season just terminated has been one of the most interesting since the institution of the Crystal Palace Concerts. All the nine symphonies of Beethoven have been given—from No. 1, in C, to No. 9, in D—the last, as far as the three introductory orchestral movements are concerned, in a style as nearly as possible reaching perfection. Then we have had many novelties, among the most interesting of which must be classed certain works by English composers—such, for example, as the Mass in F by Mr. Crowther Alwyn (Royal Academy of Music); the Symphony in F by Mr. Cowen (his "No. 2"); the overture to Andromeda by Mr. Gadsby, one of our ablest and most cultivated musicians; the Concerto in E minor for organ, composed by Mr. Prout, and performed by Dr. Stainer; Mr. Henry Smart's overture to King René's Daughter; an overture in D, by Mr. Shakespeare, and a "Festival Overture" by Mr. Wingham (both of the Royal Academy of Music—the first being the "Mendelssohn Scholar" recently elected). We lay particular stress upon the English compositions because we think that in their newly-adopted policy the Crystal Palace directors have it in their power to accomplish a world of good. Not a single work by an English composer hitherto introduced has done anything but credit to the concerts. Of the foreign music presented for the first time—comprising, among other things, a violoncello concerto by Signor Piatti, an overture by Julius Rietz, an orchestral scherzo by Herr Stiehl, and last, not least, a Symphony in B flat by Schubert, one of the most unpretentious and at the same time one of the most charming productions of his never-tiring and rarely-uninspired genius—there is no necessity to speak. The foreigners have taught the English a great deal, and that the English have not failed to profit by the teaching is sufficiently proved in the flourishing existence of the orchestral concerts given every Saturday for six months running, at the Crystal Palace, and the Quartet Concerts held by Mr. Arthur Chappell for about the same period in St. James's Hall. Nowhere else in Europe can they be matched.

Few amateurs will regret to hear that the Crystal Palace "Summer Concerts," at which from time to time the Italian operatic singers may be heard, are for the future to be held in the concert-room, which thus will enable Mr. Manns, on every occasion, to combine with their special attraction some of those classical orchestral pieces he knows how to direct so well, and has so thoroughly at heart. The first is announced for Saturday week, the 10th of May—when Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Signors Mongini and Agnesi are to appear, besides the celebrated pianist, Herr Hans von Bülow.

FUNERAL OF MR. AUGUSTUS HARRIS.

One of those large gatherings which denote an extended popularity, centred in some conspicuous name, poured through the gates of Brompton Cemetery a little before one o'clock on Friday the 25th ult. At that hour, the hearse conveying the remains of Mr. Augustus Harris, of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, to their last resting place, entered the ground. Five mourning coaches and twelve private carriages, most of them occupied, but two or three being empty, with the shutters drawn up as a mark of respect, followed, slowly making their way through a dense crowd. The artists, not alone of that great lyric theatre with which the name of the deceased was closely knit, but representing the whole of the dramatic, as well as musical world, constituted the major portion of the crowd; but men of eminence in each of the liberal arts were also present. The mourners were those of the lamented gentleman's own family, male and female, who have most cause to mourn his early death. There were his widow, his three daughters, and his two sons. Mr. Gye, being prevented by illness from attending, was represented by a near relative. After the service in the chapel, the coffin—of polished oak—was borne, by eight chosen mechanics belonging to the Opera House, along a circuitous path which avoided the thickest part of the crowd, to the grave on the eastern side of the catacombs. It is close to the handsome granite monument of the veteran actor, T. P. Cooke. Contributions of flowers were laid upon the top of the coffin as it came slowly onward, till there was a snowy pile of camelias and white amaranth, intermixed with violets. The chorus of the Royal Italian Opera sang one of the most touching, impressive, and beautiful pieces from Spohr's Last Judgment—the quartet and chorus, "Blest are the departed"—and during this solemn music, which was accompanied by reed instruments, the greater number of those who crowded round the grave were moved to tears.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

This famous association gave its third concert for the present season in St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening week, and again achieved a substantial success. The programme, wholly made up of part-songs and vocal and instrumental solos, presented variety enough to satisfy all tastes, and ministered to the pleasure of the entire audience. Among the concerted pieces were Reay's "Dawn of Day," Pearsall's "Oh, who will o'er the downs so free?" and an arrangement by Mr. Leslie of "Believe me if all those endearing young charms." These came first, and the arrangement just named headed a long list of successes. Among the other fortunate selections were Walter Macfarren's capital part-song, "You stole my love;" Benedict's spirited hunting-song, "Rise, sleep no more;" Barnby's favourite setting of "Sweet and low;" and Sullivan's universally popular "Hush thee, my baby." All these were splendidly sung under Mr. Leslie's direction, the refinement and precision of the choir being simply perfect. A good deal of the success of the concert resulted from the efforts of the soloists in songs, &c., which have long been popular. Miss Julia Wigan, the clever and promising pupil of Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, created a marked effect in "Should he upbraid," and was recalled, only the late hour preventing an encore. Miss Wigan should be heard again, and often, at concerts of English music. Mdme. Patey sang, with all beauty of voice, Arne's "Gentle Youth," and "Near Woodstock town." Mr. Henry Guy was favourably heard in "The Pilgrim of Love," as was Mr. Valentine Smith in "When other lips" (encored). Mr. R. Latter exhibited a bass voice of excellent quality in its lower register by singing Bishop's "'Tis when to sleep the world retires," and Mr. Santley excited the enthusiasm of his audience in Macfarren's "When Bacchus invented the bowl," "Sally in our alley," and "Down among the dead men." Mr. Santley might have repeated all his selections in answer to the applause he received, but he only accepted an encore for the third song. Some showy pianoforte morceaux were played by Mdlle. Le Brun, and afforded an agreeable relief.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first concert of this society's twenty-second season derived considerable interest from the variety and excellence of the works performed. Dr. Wylde, who continues to direct the orchestra with which his name has long been identified, provided something for all manner of cultivated tastes, beginning with Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8), and ending with the overture to Faniska, by Beethoven's great contemporary, Cherubini. No selections could have been more welcome, or more fittingly have opened and closed the programme, than these, and by these the highest forms of orchestral music were admirably represented. Two solo instrumentalists made their appearance at this concert; both of them young men, and neither of them free from artistic immaturity. M. Cros St. Ange, a violoncellist, who first visited London last season, played a concerto in E minor by "Lindner"—whether Frederic Lindner or his son Roderic the programme did not say, nor does it much matter, seeing that a more dreary composition could hardly be found. M. St. Ange's performance did not atone for the slight interest of the music, and his appearance as a soloist, when any violoncellist taken at random from the orchestra could have done the work better, was another proof of the blind respect which Englishmen have for foreign talent, simply because it is foreign. M. St. Ange was recalled at the close of his task, for reasons we failed to discern. His fellow soloist was Signor Rendano, who introduced Chopin's pianoforte Concerto in E minor. We have several times had to comment upon the playing of this clever young gentleman, and there is nothing new to be said about it in the present case. As usual, ability enough was shown to warrant a hope of high attainment by-and-bye. The pièce de résistance of the concert was a long selection from Handel's L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso, including nearly all the most popular and best known numbers, some of which gave unqualified satisfaction. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington has not often been heard to greater advantage than in "Come, thou goddess, fair and free," and more especially in the air which she holds as her own against all comers, "Sweet bird, that shuns the noise of folly." The accomplished soprano's rendering of the last-named, admirably supported by the flute obbligato of Mr. Radcliffe, was perfect, and drew forth the loudest applause of the evening. Mr. Castle, the American tenor, had been called upon to take the place of Mr. Lloyd at short notice, and may claim indulgence for his rendering of music evidently unfamiliar. The choruses were for the most part efficiently given. In addition to her share of the Handelian selection, Madame Sherrington gave the cavatina, "Della rosa il bel vermiglio," from Rossini's Bianca e Faliero, the echo effects of which she produced with remarkable skill and truthfulness of intonation.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

The repetition of Hamlet, Le premier Jour de Bonheur, and Geneviève de Brabant, having taken place since my last, I did not think of writing last week, but waited till to-day. I can now write of "première" representations in the shape of La Favorita, Les Dragons de Villars, and La Belle Hélène (rather a mixture!). The first was well played to a good audience, and deservedly well received; Mdme. Depoitiers singing, for the last time this season, as Leonore; M. Bresson as Fernand (ça se dit), and M. Fronty as Alphonso XI.—Les Dragons de Villars, by Maillart, was played last Thursday. It is a charming opéra-comique, full of pretty airs and choruses. Among the former is a duet, most suitable for a little "pièce de salon," and as such you may have heard it, as I have had the pleasure of doing (and beautifully rendered too), by M. and Mdme. Reichardt. Mdlle. Noaille and M. Bouvard, who, since the departure of Mdme. Depoitiers and M. Bresson, have taken the premiers rôles, sang this duet with taste, as they also did all through the opera. M. Clement having decided to keep the theatre open a week longer than he had intended, and some of his artists having to leave, we have had a week, or rather seven days, of Offenbach; La Belle Hélène, with some artists specially engaged, was the first. The part of the heroine was sustained by a Mdlle. Geraldine (des Bouffes Parisiens), very "Bouffe Parisien" in voice, form, and manner. M. Laurent, "tenor d'operetta," took the part of Paris. Altogether the piece went well, and seemed quite appreciated; and if Barbe-Bleue, to-morrow, and La Grande Duchesse, on Saturday, go as well, M. Clement will not repent of his decision.

On Tuesday, before the "opéra-bouffe," we had a very pretty little opéra-comique, in one act, by A. Adam—Le Farfadet. The music is bright and light, Mdme. Faigle throwing herself into the part of Babet; while M. Fronty sang, as he always does, carefully and accurately; but it was rather hard to believe that Farfadet was our, now well-known, Hamlet.—Last night a second representation of La Belle Hélène and the second act of L'esplanade, (pour "les adieux de M. Fronty") was announced to be played; but, about four or five p.m., there was posted "Relache, cause d'indisposition," I believe, of Mdlle. Geraldine. S. C.

April 30, 1872.

MADRIGAL.

Every robin-redbreast takes himself a mate!
Say the birds, sing the birds, "It is wrong to wait Till the lily-footed spring glides out at summer's gate."
So I heard the birds sing, once upon a day:
O, my treasure! O, my pleasure! Canst thou say me nay?

Birds' songs and birds' nests and green boughs together,
All gone: love alone laughs at bitter weather.
Summer days or winter days; little recks Love whether;
If so be that Love have his own, his darling way.
Ah, my fairest! Ah, my rarest! Canst thou say me nay?

In the wood the wind-flower is sunken out of sight,
Low down and deep down and world-forgotten quite.
But do you think the wind forgets that she was sweet and white?
Then listen to his sad voice a little while, I pray!
O, my cruel! O, my jewel! Canst thou say me nay?

The sun stole to a red rose and wiled her leaves apart:
May dew and June air had wooed her at the start;
But was't not fair the sun should have her golden, perfect heart?
Let me choose one short word for timid lips to say:
Ah, my precious! My delicious! It shall not be Nay!

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S

Pianoforte Recitals.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ has the honour to announce that his Thirteenth Series of PIANOFORTE RECITALS will take place on the following Afternoons:—

|---|---|
| FRIDAY, May 9, | FRIDAY, June 6, |
| FRIDAY, May 16, | FRIDAY, June 13, |
| FRIDAY, May 23, | FRIDAY, June 20. |
| FRIDAY, May 30, | |

The Programme of each "Recital" will include several concerted pieces for Pianoforte and other Instruments, duets, trios, quartets, &c., one of which (at least) will invariably be selected from works belonging to the "modern German school"—from Robert Schumann to Johannes Brahms, Raff, &c., and, as heretofore, a grand sonata for Pianoforte alone, by Beethoven, or some other great composer. Shorter solos for Pianoforte or other instruments will stand in the place of the two vocal solos formerly included in the programmes, which, as on previous occasions, will consist of as many pieces as may limit the duration of the performance to two hours—from Three o'clock to Five P.M. For the concerted pieces Mr. HALLÉ has secured the valuable co-operation of Mdme. NORMAN-NERUDA (Violin), Herr STRAUS (Viola), Signor PIATTI (Violoncello), &c. Descriptions, analytical and historical, of the various compositions will, as usual, accompany the programmes.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1873.

SCHUMANN, it appears, is to have a monument raised over his grave in the pretty cemetery at Bonn. We do not see that there is any need of it. The modest memorial which already marks the spot where a wearied worker sleeps is quite enough. For the rest, Schumann's music will answer. It is his best, because his most enduring monument. Marble and brass are all very well in their way, and serve a certain purpose when they assert the greatness of kings, and the wisdom of counsellors—qualities which sometimes need to be asserted very much. But who really requires a marble Beethoven? Under what imaginable circumstances can it be necessary to cast Mozart in bronze, and stick him on a granite pedestal? The men, though dead, live and breathe in their works. We do not raise monuments to the living—save when the living is an Iron Duke, and then we hold him up to ridicule on the top of an arch, pointing significantly nowhere. But we must take the world as we find it, and the world fancies that the effigies of its heroes are an honour to heroism, just as it attaches value to bits of coloured ribbon, stars, and garters. Standing on the common ground, then, it is clear that Schumann should have a statue. Even those who hold that he was not one of the "great masters" will agree that he was great enough for such an honour. A gifted, earnest soul was in the man, and remembrance of the melancholy fate which overtook him, too soon for his art, adds pity to the admiration which his name excites. Pity is akin to love, and love prompts to sacrifice. So the chain is complete which connects Schumann with the monument to be raised by willing contributions made by generous hands.

As our readers must already know, a Festival will take at Bonn, in August next, with a view to raise funds for the proposed Memorial. The proceedings will last four days, beginning on the 17th and ending on the 20th. As to the nature of those proceedings we are now able to furnish particulars which will enable every reader to form his own opinion, and determine whether it will be worth while to include Bonn in his autumnal tour. On the first day (Sunday), the programme contains but one work—Brahms' German Requiem, with which our English amateurs have lately made acquaintance. Paradise and the Peri is set down for the second day. The third day's scheme includes the overture to Manfred, the pianoforte Concerto in A minor, and the Symphony, No. 2, in C major. Chamber music takes precedence on the last day, the selection being the string Quartet in A major, the Variations for two pianofortes, and the Pianoforte Quintet in E flat. It is plain from this that the Festival will be a worthy representation of Schumann's genius, and a fitting incentive to that public recognition of his genius which is the object mainly desired. And now as to the executants. Over the rank and file we pass, because German carefulness will assuredly not stop short of efficiency. The principals include Madame Schumann, whose presence on the occasion will have a peculiar interest; Madame Joachim, Herr Stockhausen, and Herr Schulze, with Herr Joachim and Herr Wasielewski (Schumann's biographer) as conductors. The leaders of the orchestra will be Herr Straus and Herr Königslowe. These names are their own recommendation, and afford a guarantee of excellence which cannot fail to supplement the attractions of the programme.

What do Schumann's English admirers say to all this?—Will they not turn from the flaring attractions of Vienna, or, at any rate, halt on their way to them, that due honour may be paid at the shrine of a man to whom honour is unquestionably due? No doubt, many a score of English amateurs have already determined to represent their country at the festivities of the pretty town on the Rhine, and to supply an English quota to the funds wherewith Schumann's memorial will be erected.

MDME. CHRISTINE NILSSON has arrived in London to fulfil her engagement with Mr. Mapleson at Her Majesty's Opera.

THE LATE AUGUSTUS HARRIS.—We lately announced that an entertainment would be given at the Royal Italian Opera, on the 21st May, for the benefit of the family of the late Mr. Augustus Harris, Mr. Gye having kindly given his magnificent theatre for that purpose. Madame Adelina Patti has telegraphed from Vienna that she will be highly pleased to give her services on the occasion.

Character Divers.

(From "Another World.")

Character-divers, called in our language "Djarke," are distinct from the masters, called "Zicche," or fathers of knowledge, able men, who have charge of the boys' studies. The qualities which enable a preceptor to impart literary and scientific knowledge differ widely from those fitted for searching out, discriminating and correcting faults of character, interpreting the real principles which nature has implanted in the youthful aspirant, and devising the measures to be taken for correction or development. Even if the necessary qualities for both duties were united in one master, there would be many objections to the duties being entrusted to the same person. The character-divers are as it were moral physicians, skilled in the detection and cure of the hidden germs of mental maladies; for, as you will see hereafter, I was not content to wait till a disease, whether of the mind or body, had developed itself, spreading contagious poison through the veins and arteries of society, and propagating evil without end; the germ was destroyed before it had acquired force to injure.

In our planet neither the faults nor the virtues of children show themselves in the same way; the indications vary in each child according to his temperament and the circumstances in which he may be placed. Faults and qualities are often of a kind seemingly opposed to what they actually demonstrate to the character-diver —particularly in children endowed with genius. Fair, and even beautiful, outcroppings are sometimes indications of noxious weeds hidden below the surface. Weeds are not unfrequently born from the very richness and exuberance of the soil, whilst many a dark and seemingly sterile stem conceals the embryo of fruit and flowers which a genial sunshine will call into life and beauty. These, and other considerations, demand great—almost constant—attention on the part of the "Djarke."

Another reason for separating the two offices of fathers of knowledge and character-divers is, that the child's peculiarities are generally shown out of school-hours. Hence, for the purpose of detecting or tracing their real cause, and suggesting the remedy, the character-diver is often obliged to enter into terms of intimacy with the children, particularly those of tender age, to obtain their confidence, perhaps to be their playmate and friend, that the little ones may be at their ease, conceal nothing, and almost look upon him as they would upon some tame animal. The younger children with us require more watchfulness and skill in their treatment than those of maturer age. The defects of the young, like incipient disease, are less obvious, and their intelligence is less developed.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society conclude their forty-first season on Friday next, the 9th inst., when Mendelssohn's Elijah will be performed as an extra concert. The principal vocalists will be Madame Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley. The performance, conducted by Sir Michael Costa, will commence at eight o'clock.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.—The second season of this Society will terminate on Wednesday next, the 7th inst., when Handel's oratorio Belshazzar will be revived, with Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. Lewis Thomas as the solo vocalists; Dr. Stainer presiding at the organ. To the musical public this concert will be of very great interest, as Belshazzar has only been performed twice during the last hundred years; and it is well known that some very fine specimens of the great composer's writing (notably among the choruses) are to be found in this work. The concert will be, as usual, under the direction of Mr. Barnby.

M. FAURE is singing in Brussels, where, during the last fortnight, he has met with distinguished success. He contemplates visiting Liege, Ghent, and other cities. Meanwhile, M. Faure is not ill replaced by Mr. Gye's new singer, M. Maurel.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

NOT even music can fall into the hands of religionists without calling up some form of the hateful odium theologicum. The Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, with which a prominent dissenting minister is connected, sees a "scarlet rag" even in the popularity of Bach's Passion, and thus it raises the cry "ad leones":—

"It cannot be expected that Protestants should feel much sympathy with the spirit in which Bach's Passions-musik is being brought into England, connected as it is with the High Church and Ritualist party, one of whose organs distinctly welcomes it as a stepping stone towards the revival of the mediæval miracle plays. The theme, dwelling exclusively on the physical sufferings of Christ, breathes the spirit—as Mr. Macfarren confesses in his introduction of the work—of a theology which is dead and buried. The great length of the recitatives, and the infrequency of choruses make the Passion compare unfavourably with Handel. The recitatives are doubtless very beautiful, the interlocutory utterances of the chorus overpowering in elocutional grandeur, but we think the large audiences are to be ascribed partly to the novelty of the thing, and partly to the growth of High Church and Roman Catholic observances."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

BRIXTON.—On Thursday evening, the 26th ult., Miss Adeline Paget gave a concert at Brixton, and made her début as a vocalist. The lady, although suffering from evident nervousness, very favourably impressed the audience with her vocal talents, and received a warm greeting upon each appearance in the orchestra. Her best effort was, perhaps, Mr. Clay's ballad, "She wandered down the mountain side," but in the "Last Rose of Summer" the full pathos of the composition was certainly reflected. Miss Paget adds a graceful presence to the possession of a soprano voice of fair quality and good compass. The concert was supported by, amongst others, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mdlle. Friece, a lady violinist whose finished execution was greatly admired. The hall was filled by an elegant company, and the entertainment may be pronounced a most successful one.—W. H. P.

MR. ARTHUR J. BARTH gave an evening concert on Saturday last, at St. George's Hall, which attracted a full and appreciative audience. Mr. Barth is a pianist of the legitimate school, which he fully proved by his performance of Beethoven's Grand Sonata in C, Op. 53; Schumann's "Schlummerlied;" and the same composer's "Traumes-Wirren;" and in conjunction with Messrs. Pollitzer and Paque, of Mendelssohn's Grand Trio in C minor, Op. 66; Chopin's "Introduction and Polonaise," for violoncello and pianoforte; and Schumann's "Rondeau Brilliant," for pianoforte and violin. Mr. Barth was assisted vocally by Mdme. Florence Lancia, who was encored in a French chanson, and Miss Jessie Royd, who sang Bishop's "Ye little birds," with a flute obbligato (admirably played by Mr. L. Barrett), both artists receiving loud applause; as did also Miss Leonore Braham, a pupil of the London Academy of Music, in Schubert's song, "Meine Ruh ist hin." This young lady is possessed of an expressive voice, and it will be her own fault if she does not gain fame and fortune by it. Mr. J. W. Turner, by his singing of Mdme. Clara Schumann's song, "How shall I woo her?" gained the applause of the audience. He also sang "I stood on the shore," the composition of Mr. Barth. Mr. W. Maby accompanied the vocal music.

KENNINGTON.—Miss Ellen Dix, whose singing at the concerts of the Walworth Choral Union we have upon more than one occasion referred to in commendatory terms, gave a concert last Monday in the Horns' Assembly Room, before a large and appreciative audience. The bénéficiaire chose for her vocal performance a simple little ballad by Mr. Henry Gadsby, entitled "Those little words," and a recitative and air from La Sonnambula, earning for each a most enthusiastic and well deserved encore. Miss Dix was assisted by Madame Poole, Miss Kate Wild, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. J. H. Charlwood, and Messrs. William and Gerald Gadsby; whilst Mr. Henry Gadsby contributed a pianoforte solo in each part, and Mr. Henry Parker very efficiently performed the duties of accompanist.—W. H. P.

MDLLE. ALIE LINDBERG'S "first morning concert" was given in the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday. Mdlle. Lindberg is a young pianist of repute in Russia; and, judging from her performances on Monday, deserves the reputation awarded to her. Her selection of pieces will be approved of by our readers when we state that they included Mendelssohn's grand Trio in D minor, a Loure and Rondo by Bach, and Schumann's "Dream," in the first part; and Thalberg's grand Fantasia on Don Juan, a Nocturne by Field, a Gavotte by Martini, and a "Russian Melody," by Liszt, in the second part. Each of these showed the fair pianist had studied, and studied to advantage, compositions of different schools of music. The warm applause accorded to Mdlle. Lindberg was justly her due, and there is no doubt of her being a welcome addition to the concert-room. In the trio, Mdlle. Lindberg had the valuable assistance of Herr Wiener (violin) and Herr Daubert (violoncello), who, besides, favoured the audience with some admirable solos; Herr Wiener proving himself a master of his instrument by his performance of a violin Sonata by Handel, and Herr Daubert of a violoncello Sonata by Marcelli, the pianoforte accompaniment to which was admirably played by Herr Wilhelm Ganz. The vocalists were Madame Elena Corani, whose dramatic reading of Rossini's cavatina, "Bel raggio," was remarkably good; and Miss Mary Crawford, whose agreeable contralto voice was heard to advantage in the late Mr. Linley's popular song, "Thou art gone from my gaze." The rooms were full and fashionably attended, and the concert gave general satisfaction.

Mr. Aguilar's performances of pianoforte music on Friday, April 25th, consisted of Sonata, Op. 31, No. 2, Beethoven; "Oft in the stilly night" (transcription), Aguilar; Polacca in E flat, Weber; Spinnerlied, from Wagner's Fliegende Hollander, Liszt; Sonata in D, Aguilar; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Fantasia on Lucia, Aguilar; "Schlummerlied," and "Hunting Song," Schumann; "Dream Dance," and "Couleur de rose" Galop brillant), Aguilar.

PROVINCIAL.

Edinburgh.—We take the following from the Edinburgh Daily Review (April 21st):—

"Professor Oakeley gave a special organ recital on Saturday evening, in the music classroom, to the Edinburgh Choral Union. The hall was well filled, and the members of the Union enjoyed a delightful evening. The music selected was entirely classical, such as a musical association might be expected to appreciate. It gave scope for the professor's mastery of his instrument, and his performances were much applauded. Before commencing the recital, Professor Oakeley congratulated the Union on the progress they had made in public favour. Towards the close of the performance, the president of the Union moved a cordial vote of thanks to him for his kindness in inviting the members of the Union to so excellent a performance, and the motion met with a hearty response."

The Scotsman, (of the same date), winds up its article as below:—

"The chief novelties were a sonata by Corelli, and some of the Professor's own compositions. His organ andante is a pure, musicianly, and attractive movement—it appeared in the last number of the Organist's Quarterly Journal; the minuet belongs to a sonata which is presently to be published. We had a very fine reading of all the pieces, and before the close the President of the Choral Union tendered the thanks of that Society to Dr. Oakeley for the treat of the evening."

Leicester.—The lovers of high-class music generally, and those who are desirous of encouraging and promoting a taste for the music of our best English composers especially, are deeply indebted to Mr. Nicholson for the admirable bill of fare he submitted to his patrons on the evening of Tuesday last. The works given were Sir W. S. Bennett's pastoral, "The May Queen," and Mr. John Francis Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner; the former being heard in Leicester for the first time, and the latter not having been brought before the Leicester public since 1869. The soloists were Miss Banks, Miss Adelaide Newton, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale, supported by the full band of the New Philharmonic Society. The attendance was scarcely so large as might have been expected considering the high quality of the programme provided, and the talents of the executive staff. The May Queen, from the overture to the finale, received full justice, vocalists and instrumentalists alike acquitting themselves in an admirable manner. The merits of The Ancient Mariner were also highly appreciated, the demonstrations of approval which ever and anon broke forth conclusively proving, if any such proof were needed, that Mr. Barnett's masterpiece will fully bear repetition.

Prescott.—The last concert of the season was given by the Harmonic Society, on Wednesday, 23rd April, under the conductorship of Mr. W. D. Hall. The principals were Madame Billinie Porter, Mr. George Barton, and Mr. A. Brown—Mr. F. H. Burstall presiding at the harmonium, and Mr. T. H. Cooke at the pianoforte—assisted by a chorus of over fifty voices. The first part consisted of selections from the Creation. Madame Porter was remarkably successful in "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," and the singing of the two gentlemen was also good. In the second part Madame Porter was encored in Handel's "Let me wander not unseen." One of the part-songs received a similar compliment, and Mr. Barton was recalled after his two songs. Mr. Hall deserves credit for the efficiency of the chorus.

Rochester.—A correspondent informs us that:—"The Musical Union of this ancient city gave their second 'open night' on Monday April 21st, in the Corn Exchange. The artists were all amateurs (excuse the Irishism), and acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of their friends, who attended 'in force.' Among the pieces that gave general satisfaction were Mr. G. A. Macfarren's part-song 'Under the greenwood tree,' Mendelssohn's 'The victor's return,' and the choral march from Costa's Naaman, 'With sheathed sword.' A song by Signor G. Tartaglione, 'Berceuse' (composed for the occasion), with flute accompaniment, admirably played by Captain Thomas, and charmingly sung by Mrs. Thomas; as well as two movements from Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, the andante and allegro, capitally executed by Mrs. Nutter (pianoforte). Mr. H. Ivimey and the Rev. Mr. Nutter (violin and violoncello) deserve special mention; and I have only to add that everyone was pleased with the entertainment provided for them."

Stroud.—Mr. E. W. Christie, of Exeter College, Oxford, gave a "Concert of Old English Music," at the Subscription Rooms, on Tuesday, April 22nd, before a large and enthusiastic audience. The singers were Master Aynsley Cooke, of St. George's Chapel, Windsor: Master Aldridge, of New College, Oxford; Mr. Bickley, alto of the Birmingham Glee Union; Mr. Kearton, tenor, of Wells Cathedral; Mr. Hunt, tenor, of St. George's, Windsor; Mr. Hallewell, bass, of New College, and Mr. Brandon. The pianists were Miss Clark, of Stroud, and Mr. Powell, of Exeter College, Oxford. The whole programme was throughout satisfactorily performed. Of the concerted music, the most successful pieces were Mornington's fine glee, "Here let me lie," the beautiful sestett from Dr. Crotch's Palestine, and "Cold is Cadwalla's tongue," with the solo, most expressively sung by Mr. Hallewell; who also declaimed with grand effect Purcell's "Ye twice ten hundred deities." Mr. Brandon was encored in "Flow, thou regal purple stream," and Mr. Kearton in "The Thorn." The trebles, however, won the lion's share of applause, obtaining three encores between them; for "The Summer Heats," Master Cooke substituted Arne's popular "Pray Goody;" and Master Albridge the same composer's "Water parted from the sea" for "Where the Bee sucks." A Study, by Cipriani Potter, played by Miss Clark, was a most finished performance. It is to be hoped that so successful an attempt to revive the music of old English masters may be repeated before long.

Billesdon.—The concert given in the Forester's Hall, by Mr. Nicholson, of Leicester, was a rich treat. The flute in the hands of Mr. Nicholson seems to possess a magical power; he was listened to throughout with breathless attention, and his solo was exquisitely played. Madame Wells, in "Esmeralda," delighted the audience, and in "Lo, here the gentle lark," with flute obbligato by Mr. Nicholson, was vociferously encored. Mr. Christian was encored in "Homeward bound." Altogether it was the best concert we have heard in the Hall, and deserved to be patronized better than it was; but we hope, should Mr. Nicholson again visit Billesdon, to see the Hall crowded.

Birkenhead.—A new organ, built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, for the Trinity United Presbyterian Church, Claughton, was opened on Friday evening, the 18th April, before a large audience. The instrument has two manuals and sixteen stops, besides couplers, and is in every way a great credit to its builders. The cost, £550, has been nearly all raised by voluntary subscriptions among the congregation.

Exeter.—On Monday evening last, the Oratorio Society gave a successful performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus in the Victoria Hall, it being the first subscription concert of the year. The solos were allotted respectively to Mdlle. Pauline Rita (soprano), Madame Demeric-Lablache (contralto), Mr. Vernon Rigby (tenor), and Signor Federici (basso). Mr. G. W. Lyon was the conductor, and Mr. M. G. Rice the leader. We can congratulate the chorus upon the precision with which it acquitted itself, while the efforts of the soloists were worthy of the high reputation they enjoy.—The Theatre Royal is still open, under the management of Mr. Frederick Hebe. On Monday evening last, Mr. and Mrs. Wybert Rousby commenced an engagement of five nights, and have succeeded in drawing crowded houses. The pièce de résistance has been Tom Taylor's popular historical play of 'Twixt Axe and Crown, in which Mr. and Mrs. Rousby have been admirably supported by Miss Douglas, Miss Burns, Miss Nicholls, and Miss Bella-Cuthbert; Mr. Archibald Lindsay, Mr. H. Coombs, Mr. E. Kelly, Mr. E. Shepherd, Mr. C. Frome, Mr. D. Honeysett, Mr. Pepperell, and Mr. Sam Stoney.—Weston S. Jackson.

The Royal Academy of Music has received two additions to its funds in the donation of £50 from Wm. Atkinson, Esq., of 47, Gordon Square; and of the same amount from the Goldsmiths' Company, transmitted through Charles Sparrow, Esq.

Stettin.—A successful performance of C. H. Graun's Passion-Music, Der Tod Jesu, was lately given in St. Jacob's church by the Musical Union.

ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—After sending you my last appeal, I felt some hope of being noticed, at least, and perhaps some valued friend would thereby bring my forlorn case before the public, and I found myself humming, "Come again bright days," as I dozed off into a delightful sleep, and dreamt a delightful dream. I thought the costly mansion (on whose doorstep I have taken up my abode), which is falling to decay for want of a tenant, was magnificently furnished, and filled to overflowing with the nobility and beauty of the land; the air was filled with the delicious melody of sweet songs and the applause was quite deafening, as the young and rising singers appeared before the multitude of admirers, who seemed astonished that such sweet voices could be found, and so much talent existed in their own country; and I was taken tenderly by the hand, and led forward to receive a perfect ovation, and was once more placed upon my pedestal, from which I had been thrust by the rude hand of coarse vulgarity and foreign assumption! "'Twas but a dream!" As I sat out in the cold musing upon the past, I was aroused from my reverie by the postman thrusting into my hand the Musical World. Accept my very grateful thanks for publishing my letters, and so clearly placing my neglected state and just claims before the Government and the public. How true, sir, is the concluding remark in your able article:—"An hour's earnest thought over the matter will do more for English Opera than all the virtuous indignation in the world." Is not the fortune of our lyric stage worth so much of effort? With your powerful aid, I am quite sure, I shall soon be brought into notice; and the public will only be too glad to foster and encourage me in my efforts to raise myself to the same level as my foreign neighbours; and it can be done, by careful training and the patronage of the wealthy!

Yours gratefully,

Miss English Opera.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Daily Telegraph thus discussed the Sacred Harmonic Society's performance of Bach's Passion music:—

"If the design of this society in the performance of Bach's Matthew Passion, on Friday evening, was to aim a deadly blow at the growing popularity of that remarkable work, we are bound to say that the result was a great success. Of course no such an idea was entertained. The directors saw the great progress made by the Passion since Mr. Barnby began to keep it persistently before the public, and, after turning the matter over with a deliberation befitting a venerable and strictly conservative body, they determined to recognise the work. Not often, of late, have they done anything more laudable, or more honourable to themselves. Having resolved to produce the Passion, all precedent was favourable to its being adapted for a modern orchestra, and otherwise touched up for effect. But—mirabile dictu!—the directors made up their minds not only to perform the work as Bach left it, even to the use of such an antique instrument as the viol da gamba, but also to perform it entire, not missing a single recitative, air, chorale, or chorus. Theoretically unassailable as was this resolution, we hold that it was practically a mistake. If the performance was merely intended as a curiosity, never to be repeated, something may be said for it; but, even so, consideration of possible bad results should have had a restraining effect. The directors must have known—to suppose the contrary would not flatter them—that the entire work, made up, as it largely is, of antiquated and, save from an antiquarian point of view, uninteresting airs, would weary the best-disposed audience, and damage the reputation of the music as a whole. Besides, if special importance was attached to the idea of giving the Passion entire, the directors failed to carry that idea out, "cuts" being made in Nos. 29, 61, and 75. The principle of completeness thus violated, it is hard to see why the principle of utility was not more studied. Moreover, it is far from certain that any value belongs to completeness in regard to Bach's work. The tedious airs referred to above are not essential parts of the Passion, and were probably added from time to time as occasion seemed to demand. They have no more to do with the story than have the marginal texts which accompany it in the New Testament, and may be ignored entirely, without loss to the sacred drama. Under such circumstances we cannot compliment the Sacred Harmonic Society upon a striking assertion of a great principle, while we have to charge them with inadvertent injury to a noble work. Evidence of that inquiry was clear enough on Friday evening. At first the large audience showed great interest in what they heard, and one half of the music had all the success that could be desired. But soon after the second part began, the audience commenced to break up; and, during the remainder of the four hours occupied by the performance, melted away, till, at half-past eleven, the delicious final chorus was sung to a handful of hearers, consisting partly of enthusiasts, partly of those obstinate souls who never know when they are beaten. By no means flattering to Bach's music were the comments of the jaded remnant as they retired—and poor, indeed, from that moment, became the prospects of ever hearing it again in Exeter Hall. As to the performers, they gallantly obeyed their inflexible chief—Sir Michael Costa—who carried out his programme with a heart steeled to the sufferings before and behind him. Occasionally weariness told its tale in the music; but the rally of both band and chorus, when in sight of 'home,' was surprising, the final concerted numbers being given with all the vigour of their earliest predecessors. As to the performance generally, it deserved much praise, looking at the novelty of the subject. The choruses were often highly impressive, especially 'Have lightnings and thunders,' which produced a magnificent effect. The chorales, given with organ and double basses, came out grandly from the mass of voices; and the orchestra was as perfect as Sir M. Costa's orchestra usually is. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Patey, Mr. Chaplin Henry, and Mr. Santley, gave an effect to the solos which it is needless to particularise. Mention, should be made, however, of Mr. Lloyd's admirable and well-sustained delivery of the recitatives; nothing could have been better. Praise is also due to M. Sainton, Mr. Weist Hill, Mr. Radcliffe, and Mr. Pettit (viol da gamba), for their able performance of obbligati; nor should the efficient services of Mr. Willing at the organ be passed over."

The Globe spoke on the same subject as follows:—

"Irrefragable evidence of the present popularity—whether sincere and lasting remains to be proved—of Bach's Passion Music was afforded by its performance on Friday night by the Sacred Harmonic Society. Whether this procedure be attributable to the presence of new influences in the direction, or the irresistible force of public opinion, it must be hailed as a promising one. The society has a past of which it has a right to be proud. To be contented with the past is, however, too often to be indifferent to the future. Having reference to its age and standing, the repertory of the Sacred Harmonic Society is probably the smallest in existence. It is not for want of warnings or urgings that the Passion Music has waited some fifteen years for recognition in their doings. However, 'Better late than never.' But why so very late?"

MDLLE. ALBANI.

The Sunday Times of April 27 thus refers to Mdlle. Emma Albani's recent performance in the Sonnambula:—

"On Tuesday Mdlle. Albani played Amina (La Sonnambula), and took another step forward in the good opinion of her critical listeners. There is no disguising the fact, if anybody wishes to disguise it, that the young artist has made wonderful progress since last season and is now on the high road to a great position. We are glad of it on various grounds; first, because every good artist is a gain to art; and, next, because the result bears out what was repeatedly said in these columns last season. We then recognised Mdlle. Albani as an aspirant of the highest promise, who, nevertheless, had much to do ere a lofty place could be taken. Others contended for her perfection; but the fact that those others are now loud in proclaiming her improvement is the best testimony that we were right. It is needless to dwell upon an assumption so familiar as the Amina of Mdlle. Albani. Enough that she made the customary round of successes, which culminated in an admirable expression of the different emotions suggested by 'Ah! con credea' and 'Ah! non giunge.'"

HERR VON BÜLOW.

The opinion of the Daily News about this artist was thus expressed:—

"The occasion possessed a special interest from its having introduced, for the first time to the English public, the renowned German pianist, Dr. Hans von Bülow, who also enjoys a high reputation in his own country as a conductor; the efficient representation of some of Richard Wagner's later operas at Munich having been largely owing to the skilled and energetic supervision of Herr von Bülow, who deserves recognition as a musician of great gifts and acquirements, both practical and theoretical. The pianist received a warm greeting on Monday, and was enthusiastically applauded after his performance of Beethoven's 'Emperor' concerto, and still more so for his admirable execution of Bach's 'Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue'—the latter piece having been encored and replaced by the 'Passepied,' from the fifth of the same composer's 'Suites Anglaises.' While commanding the whole range of pianoforte music—ancient and modern, classical and romantic (much of it from memory)—it is especially as an interpreter of Bach and Beethoven that Dr. von Bülow has made his great renown; and his performance here of the grandest work of its kind—the leviathan concerto of the latter composer, was naturally looked forward to with great interest and expectation by those who only knew the pianist by report. While recognising much to admire in the pianoforte playing of Dr. von Bülow—both in the mechanical and intellectual aspect—we were yet in some respects disappointed with his interpretation of a few portions of the concerto, especially in the first movement, where the tempo and the rhythm were rather capriciously treated. His delivery of the adagio was characterized by great delicacy of touch and refinement of style, while the final rondo gave scope for that bravura playing to which it would appear the player has a strong tendency. Dr. von Bülow's future performances will be looked forward to with great interest—as such a reputation as he enjoys throughout Germany is not raised without a basis."

Stockholm.—The Diet has unanimously voted 190,000 rix-dollars to erect an Academy of Music.—M. Ambroise Thomas's Mignon has been well received at the Operahouse.

Shaber Silver Across Opera Bouffe.

With the exception of the Haymarket, the Adelphi, and the Princess's, all our theatres are at this moment devoted either to opera or to its parody, opéra-bouffe. Of the two kinds of musical drama the most popular is undoubtedly the parody, which now plays the important part occupied until within the last year or two in our popular entertainments by burlesque. After being denounced, exposed, and condemned by critics week by week, and almost day by day, ever since its birth, burlesque has now gone the way of other highly artificial forms of the drama. It is dead, and no one will regret it—probably not even burlesque writers, who now seem to turn their attention to other things, and especially "opéra-bouffe." It was not criticism that killed burlesque, or it would have died long ago. Nervous debility, exhaustion, internal corruption manifesting itself in break-downs, may have had something to do with its collapse; but what really put an end to it when it had already, from spontaneous causes, reached an advanced state of decay, was the creation and development of so-called "opéra-bouffe." This new description of opera, or operetta, while presenting the same opportunities as burlesque for the display not only of costume and scenery, but also, and above all, of person, has the additional merit of possessing something like organic life, which in burlesque has long been wanting. Burlesques had of late been produced which were not only without a connected plot, but could not even pretend to be based on an idea. Often a burlesque was a mere series of music-hall songs and nigger break-downs, performed by a number of oddly-dressed and undressed personages, who came on singing, went off dancing, and at no time took part in any dramatic action. The style was decomposed even before it was dead, and its remains have now, we fancy, been finally swept from the stage.

In a dramatic point of view, the first great point of difference between the defunct burlesque and the living opéra-bouffe consists in this: that the latter has always for its groundwork an idea, an intrigue, a plot with some pretensions to originality, whereas the former at best was constructed only on a borrowed perverted framework. In a musical sense, the difference is about the same. The music of an opéra-bouffe may be, and, critically speaking, for the most part is, deficient in originality; but it is original in so far that it has been composed expressly for the words; whereas in the exploded burlesque the words were written to familiar and usually very vulgar music. In France, the opéra-bouffe seems to have taken the place partly of the "féerie," partly of that curious form of drama known as the vaudeville, in which, as in our unesteemed burlesques, the words of the songs are written to popular tunes, but written in the spirit rather of paraphrase than parody. It has also replaced, or rather displaced, in France, the old national form of opera with spoken words known as "opéra comique." In England there was nothing of this kind for it to interfere with. Indeed, our level as regards stage singing to English words was already so low that the introduction of opéra-bouffe at numerous London theatres—accompanied, as it has been, by an improvement of orchestras, and by the engagement of singers worthy, in some cases, to be looked upon as vocalists—may be said to mark a certain musical progress. There is not one establishment where opéra-bouffe is now given at which any higher form of musical entertainment has ever been cultivated; and at two—the Alhambra, in Leicester Square, and the Philharmonic, at Islington—it has been the means of transforming music-halls into regular, well-conducted theatres. The Philharmonic Theatre is still visited partly for its performances, partly for itself. A year or two ago it began to acquire the sort of reputation that seems to have belonged, in the Paris of 1830, to the distant little theatre on the boulevards, to which the dinnerless and demented hero of La Peau de Chagrin spent his last remaining five-franc pieces in taking the coldly-unconscious Fœdora. The Philharmonic is, at least as regards private boxes and stalls, a fashionable theatre in an unfashionable neighbourhood. Ladies go only to the private boxes, where they can remain more or less concealed from the eyes of the vulgar, who fill the balcony and galleries; and, without troubling themselves about their exotic visitors, have eyes only for the stage. Both boxes and stalls are fitted up with an elegance which, by comparison with the rest of the house, seems fastidious; and there is certainly no theatre in London where the occupants of the stalls are so much at their ease. Smoking is not allowed "in any part of the theatre;" and printed announcements to that effect point to the days when the Philharmonic was still a music-hall. Drinking, however, is still tolerated (as in the pit and gallery of other theatres); though the privilege seems to be but sparingly used. Here a point may be noted in favour of halls licensed for theatrical performances as compared with halls licensed only for singing and the sale of intoxicating liquors. In marked contrast to the homeliness of attire prevalent in the galleries is the scrupulous attention to costume observed in the orchestra, where the musicians all appear in evening clothes, and, more punctilious than those of the opera, in white cravats. Nor are they remarkable for accuracy of dress alone. They play with precision and excellent ensemble. The Philharmonic Theatre being organized specially and permanently with a view to musical performances, it was essential that the manager should in the first place engage a good orchestra which, composed of good materials, was sure, by dint of practice, to gain consistency and unity of expression. The Philharmonic band (not, however, to be confounded with another of the same name) is the only one in London which, night after night, plays the same sort of operatic music all the year round. The principal singers were Miss Emily Soldene and Miss Selina Dolaro, both artists of considerable merit, and both thoroughly at home in the particular sort of operatic business to which they devote themselves, and in which, the former especially, has long been distinguished. The operetta in vogue is called Fleur de Lys—pronounced "Flurr de Liss)—in accordance with the laudable custom of the theatre, which, probably for educational purposes, requires that the titles of all the pieces produced, together with the names of the principal characters, shall be given in the French tongue. That the piece itself is of French origin "va sans dire," as they would say at Islington; but it does not prevent the personages from being well acquainted with Mr. Plimsoll, the Lord Chamberlain, Mr. Ayrton, and other notabilities favourably and unfavourably known. The adapter and responsible editor is Mr. H. B. Farnie, whose expedients for raising a laugh by means of anachronistic and generally absurd allusions (at the expense of his own work) are at least as successful here as at the Strand. Otherwise the piece is based on an ingenious and charming idea, and, as a whole, is very amusing. The music, by M. Delibès, for the most part trivial, is here and there graceful and expressive. It is marked by more artistic intention than characterises the music of opéra-bouffe generally; and the comparatively serious airs (witness the really charming serenade sung by Miss Soldene) are those in which the composer is heard to most advantage.

The performances at the Philharmonic conclude with a ballet or divertissement, called Les Folies du Carnaval, in which Mdlle. Sara, supported by a few coryphées, appears. Mdlle. Sara, who has long enjoyed a special celebrity at the Philharmonic, cultivates a style of dancing, or rather possesses a native style of her own, which may be admired or not, but which every one must admit to be remarkable. Done deliberately, and with malice aforethought, some of the feats performed by Mdlle Sara might be deemed reprehensible. Thus, regardless of Hamlet's eternal "canon 'gainst self-slaughter," she seems at times bent on braining herself with the point of a toe, which from its strength and elasticity should be made of steel. She dances not in the cantabile but in the bravura style, and in some of her most daring achievements may be said to brave a good deal. She is, in fact, less a worshipper of Terpsichore than a priestess of Bacchus, and occasionally she demeans herself like one possessed. But there is less significance than the reader who has not seen Mdlle. Sara might imagine in her wild and desperate contortions. Her peculiar mode of disporting herself seems as natural to her as swimming to the fish or flying to the bird; and her bounds and gyrations are not addressed in the usual direct manner to the audience, though the audience is, of course, expected to look at them and applaud them. It profits by this latter privilege in the most enthusiastic manner; upon which, Mdlle. Sara, instead of smiling with that falsely sweet smile which is stereotyped on the mouths of all other dancers, nods her head quite gravely with an abrupt bird-like nod, as if to intimate that that is indeed her mode of dancing, and that if the audience like it—so much the better.

SHAKESPERE'S DRAMAS AND MUSIC.

By Robert Musiol.*

Shakespere's dramas, which belong to the most lofty monuments of artistic creation, and to the most grandiose emanations of the human mind, have exercised the greatest influence not merely upon subsequent dramatic literature, but upon music as well. Shakespere's universal genius, that could not only catch but also reproduce the slightest emotions of the human heart and head, was likewise capable of appreciating the most inward and true nature and being of music. The latter, in his time, had by no means reached a state of perfection, but rather was beginning simply to try its wings, and was somewhat stiff, though displaying a certain grandeur, in its bearing. This, however, by no means prevented the poet from penetrating into the uttermost depths of its soul, and reproducing in a marvellous manner what he discovered. Nay, more; he was not unacquainted with the construction and characteristic tone of musical instruments, and knew how to turn them to advantage in the most striking comparisons. However splendid a subject this would make for a critical essay, I will not, and cannot enter on it—would that I could only reproduce what Dr. Emil Naumann said so well and so exhaustively in his article: "Shakespere in his Relation to Music." (Nachklänge, p. 98, et seqq.) Let me direct attention to a side of the question which Naumann has not so carefully considered—the use to which Shakespere's dramas have been put in music. Considering the musical themes and elements immanent in them, it is really not astonishing that the manner in which they have been thus employed has been, and will, probably, continue to be, something extraordinary. Even though a great deal of the musical additions to these magnificent dramas are more ephemeral than constant in their nature, the matter itself is so indestructible that not even the most vapid music is capable of spoiling it by bad workmanship. It has often happened that, thanks to the subject, the most insignificant and flattest music has pleased the public and attained a certain importance. This is especially the case with those dramas that have been transformed into opera-books, as well as those where Shakespere especially directed that music was to be introduced. In many of the latter cases, the dramas met with the same fate as Goethe's Faust; they had to be contented with what was added and appended to them, since there was really nothing better to be had than old and antiquated, or, under the most favourable circumstances, "conductor's" music, as it is styled in Germany.

The music to Shakespere's dramas may be ranged in three classes: Opera; Music generally; and Overtures, etc.

The adaptation of certain Shaksperian dramas is, from a genuinely artistic point of view, certainly not to be recommended, but, on the contrary, to be condemned. By the conversion, or transformation of a drama for such a musical object, its dramatic vitality is sure to be injured, if not altogether destroyed; for, strictly speaking, Drama and Opera, despite their relationship, are opposed to each other. While the drama consists of a continuous and active development of the action, and in the dialectics of thought, Opera busies itself more with developing the dialectics of the feelings. In taking, therefore, a drama as a foundation for an opera-book, the author cannot select and employ the progressive actual deeds, as much as the lyrical points of repose. In consequence of this, either the bloom is rubbed off the drama, the action being materially reduced, while the personages receive quite another—and, in the long run, diametrically opposite—appearance and character, or the opera becomes an hermaphrodite, something between dramatic life and lyrical, contemplative repose. Despite this, however, certain individuals have not been restrained from stuffing utterly unmusical subjects, such as, Macbeth and King Lear, into a musical dress-coat. Not even vampyrism and madness could resist the musical desire of music-makers thirsting for operas. In such cases, there is an end of everything, even of sense.

The drama most frequently transformed by composers into an opera is Romeo and Juliet, that "hymn of love." No other subject probably—with the sole exception of Faust, of which I myself know at least more than twenty musical arrangements—has been so often turned to musical account. The oldest operatic adaptation of Romeo and Juliet is that by Georg Benda (1721—1795). The extremely vapid and wearisome book is by Gotter. The work is an "opera in three acts;" there are four singing personages: Kapellet, Romeo, Julie, and Laura. The first performance took place at Berlin, on the 8th February, 1781. Between then and 1796 the opera was performed fifty-six times. In 1781 it was brought out, also, in Paris.

The second opera of the name is by Johann Gottfried Schwanberg (1740—1804). It is written for two sopranos and a tenor, and was first produced in 1782. It consists of two acts. A third Romeo was written by Sigismund, Baron von Rumlingen (or Rumling, 1740—1825), in 1790, for Paris. D'Alayrac's (1758—1809), Roméo et Juliette, ou tout pour Amour, came out at Paris in 1792. Speaking of it in his A travers Champs, Hector Berlioz says: "The author of the horrible book was clever enough not to tell us his name. The work is really pitiable, stupid, and thoroughly vulgar. One feels inclined to put it down as the production of two simpletons, who knew nothing of passion, feeling, common sense, French, or music."

D. Steibelt's (1755—1823) Roméo et Julie, opéra en prose, en 3 Actes, was first performed on the 3rd September, 1793, at Paris. Berlioz considers this Romeo far superior to the other operas of the same name. In 1794, Zingarelli (1752—1834) composed an opera, Romeo e Giuletta, first produced in 1796, at Milan. The most celebrated air in it, "Ombra adorata," was, according to some persons, composed, not by Zingarelli, but by Crescentini (1769—1846). In 1816, a Romeo, by Pietro Carlo Guglielmo (1763—1817), is said to have been brought out, but not a single lexicographer says a word about it. Nicolo Vaccai (1790—1836) brought out an opera, Giulia e Romeo, in 1825, at Milan, of which, likewise, one air, "Ah, se tu dormi," became very celebrated. The third act was frequently given in place of Bellini's opera of the same name, first performed at Venice, in March, 1830, and often played also under the title of I Montecchi e Capuletti. The principal part of this ninth Romeo is, according to F. Gleich (Characterbilder, p. 116), especially adapted for fair dramatic vocalists with a deep register, a slim figure, and well-shaped legs. As most people know, it was a great part of Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient. The libretto is adapted from the original play by Felix Romani. In Schilling's large Universal Lexicon (vol. vi., p. 734), under the heading "Vaccai," there is mentioned a Montecchi e Capuletti by Donizetti; but probably the one by Bellini is meant.

A tenth Romeo was produced in 1865 at Trieste, and in 1867 at Milan, by the maëstro Marchetti. On the 27th April, 1867, there was first produced in Paris Charles Gounod's Roméo, which then began its journey over nearly every stage in Europe. The libretto is written by Jules Barbier and Michel Carré, whom it is almost impossible to avoid running against in the domain of French opera-books. The music, in the new French style, is in some parts characteristic, though only superficially so, and does not belie the composer of Faust (1858). In the same year, 1867, the celebrated Parisian professor of singing, Duprez, also produced, at a private performance, a Roméo of his own composition. In 1868, there appeared a thirteenth Roméo, under the title of Les Amants de Vérone, by the Marquis de Yorey (who adopted the pseudonym of Richard Yruid), residing in Paris.

In addition to the foregoing we have also a "Romeo opera," by the celebrated poet Otto Ludvig (died in 1865); in 1868, a composer named Lehmann is said to have brought a Romeo into the world; furthermore, compositions with the same name are reported to be lying in the desk of Dr. Damrosch at New York, and in that of M. de Saint-Saëns at Paris. In 1868, Verdi promised us a Romeo; and it is stated that the Parisian composer Hervé lately began, and is still busy on, a similarly named parodistic work.

There is, also, a ballet on this subject. Luigi Marescalchi (1740-1815) composed one, Giuletta e Romeo, for Rome.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

Strassburgh.—Thanks to the untiring energy and zeal of Herr Sering, Musical Director of the Royal Seminary, a most gratifying performance of Haydn's Creation was given here in the early part of the month.

Leipsic.—The Abbate Franz Liszt lately paid this town a visit, and his admirers gave him a "banquet" in the large room of the Hôtel de Prusse.

CINCINNATI MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The preparations for our musical festival in May are now so rapidly approaching completion, that I am enabled to give you a very fair idea of the scheme; with unusual perspicacity the city authorities appear to have realized the advantages of such a large gathering as will necessarily occur, and have, therefore, placed the Exposition Building at the disposal of the committee, rent free. By this means, the festival will be held under extraordinary advantages, for the arrangement of the rooms enables the conductors to introduce a novel feature, which even the fondest lover of music cannot fail to appreciate. The idea is, to have the concerts begin somewhat earlier than is customary, say about half-past seven; then, after a performance of from an hour to an hour and a half in length, there will be a recess of thirty minutes. Doors will be opened to all parts of the building, and the audience left free to wander where it will. There will be plenty of flowers for the benefit of some, and a good restaurant for the benefit of others, so that altogether nearly every sense can be gratified. The directors have been highly complimented upon this new feature, and it is really worthy of commendation. No matter how fine a concert may be, the essential quietude is very fatiguing to many, and doubtless this opportunity for rest and a change of thought will be no less grateful to the musicians than to their auditors. Another idea, first adopted, I believe, at the Boston Jubilee, is that of keeping open a room where the chorus will have its head-quarters, receive tickets, and obtain whatever information may be desired concerning the city.

Mr. Thomas is working with his proverbial energy to make the affair a success. His intentions in regard to the concerts can be slightly gathered from one of his letters, wherein he says:—

"I wish to rehearse the choruses alternately, Friday and Saturday, May 2nd and 3rd, all day. General rehearsals with the combined forces on Monday. On Tuesday, rest during the day, and in the evening (May 6th), first concert." Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings will likewise have concerts, and on two or three of these days matinées in addition will be given. The programmes for the evening concerts are to be "pure and clean without being heavy; principally made up from the standard works of our great masters. Those for the matinées as light as good taste will allow."

To carry out the programme there will be an orchestra of one hundred and eighty, which will be supplemented by an organ of great power and capacity, now building for the festival. Of the singers those already engaged are, Mrs. Emma R. Dexter, of Cincinnati, soprano; Miss Annie Louise Cary, contralto; Mr. Nelson Varley, tenor; Mr. J. F. Rudolph, sen., baritone; Mr. M. W. Whitney, basso. A chorus of a thousand children from the public schools will occupy the stage one afternoon.

Within the past month the following societies have been enrolled: Oxford Musical Society, Oxford, Ohio; Beethoven Society, Paulding, Ohio; Sandusky Maennerchor, Sandusky, Ohio; Odd Fellow Saengerchor, Cincinnati; Urbana Choral Society, Urbana, Ohio; Philharmonic Society, Mansfield, Ohio; Port Union Singing Club, Port Union, Ohio —making in all thirty-six societies, aggregating about one thousand two hundred and fifty singers.—Correspondent of "Arcadian."

ST. PETERSBURGH.—Signor Merelli has definitely bade farewell to the managerial career, and retired as a millionaire into private life. His successor at the Imperial Theatre here and in Moscow is Signor Gantano Ferri, who has been lucky enough to secure Madame Patti for next year.

LIGHT AND HEAVY IN STARLAND.

(From "Another World.")

Electric science had greatly advanced in my reign, and electric powers had been discovered by which the heaviest masses could be lightened temporarily, so that their specific gravity, called by us the "tenacious electricity," and its tendency to seek the sympathetic electricity of the earth, was temporarily diminished, if not entirely neutralised, without injury to the mass subjected to the operation.

Though the means and end are different, the principle is not unlike that by which you often lighten the specific gravity of bodies, and even change their nature by chemical combination, the action of fire, and other expedients, the bodies often resuming their specific gravity and original form. The means we employ for lightening bodies are far more rapid and effectual, and, at the same time, the materials acted upon are less abruptly or violently changed.

WAIFS.

Men of genius had been compelled by ignorance or driven by necessity to follow occupations for which they were not fitted, and which they, indeed, often loathed: the really valuable tendencies of these men, bent in an opposite direction, were allowed to run to waste, or perhaps be used to the injury and destruction of others. I (Hermes) felt that to do justice to all and effect good incalculable, evil tendencies must be destroyed in their birth, the germs of the imperfections and crimes of the man detected and eradicated in the child; whilst valuable qualities and good tendencies must be searched out, and effective means devised for their healthful development. The most ordinary men, those even who would otherwise be swayed by gross passions, would become contented workmen in the cause of good when occupied with pursuits for which nature and education had fitted them; whilst the power and works of men of genius would be many times increased and multiplied if their education were adapted to strengthen and develop their talents, eradicate their faults, and generate auxiliary excellencies. But how could all this be effected if the first step to so desirable an end were wanting?—Another World.

Mdme. Monbelli has been singing in Rotterdam lately.

M. Miolan, brother of Mdme. Miolan-Carvalho, has just died.

Herr Franz Lachner celebrated his seventieth birthday on April 2.

Madame Parepa-Rosa and Mr. Carl Rosa have returned to London from Cairo.

Der Fliegende Holländer is shortly to be produced at Bologna, on the stage which witnessed the triumph of Lohengrin.

The Gazette Musicale announces that M. Desplaces will succeed the late Mr. Augustus Harris at the Royal Italian Opera.

M. Antoine Neukomm, brother of the late Chevalier Neukomm, and himself a musician of rank, died recently at Paris.

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast." A tribe in Wisconsin has actually organised a brass band. But on the whole the neighbours rather prefer the war-whoop.

The number before us of Dr. Spark's Organist's Quarterly Journal exhibits a novel and interesting feature—"Twelve Short Interludes," by our illustrious musician, Mr. Henry Smart.

On Tuesday last the following Professors were examined and approved for the degree of Bachelor of Music at Cambridge:—Samuel Weeks, Arthur Carnall, S. Corbett, and S. Johns.

Signor Carlo Coccia, a pupil of Paisiello, died at Novaro the other day, aged 91. He was the composer of no less than forty operas—all forgotten. He produced his opera of Marie Stuart in England, &c., half-a-century back.

Mr. Foster White has resigned the treasurership of King Edward School, Blue Coat Hospital, on account of ill health. His "parting gift" to the boys was a complete set of military band instruments of the best description.

Signor Arditi has received offers of engagement for Bologna, which he has been unable to accept, owing to the production of his "Commemoration Ode" at the Crystal Palace in June. Signor Arditi returns to London, from Vienna, next week.

According to Le Figaro, M. Gounod's opera, Polyeucte, will be produced this season in Vienna. The composer shortly leaves London to superintend the preparations. Our French contemporary further asserts that the rôle of Pauline is confided to Mrs. Weldon.

Another man has graduated at the Yale "School of Journalism." He has been rather more successful than any of his predecessors. When he found that he could get no more than 8 dols. a-week on any Western journal, he took a position as clerk in an oyster saloon, where his weekly stipend is 10 dols.

The Crystal Palace have communicated to his Majesty the Shah of Persia, through H. E. Hadji Moshin Khan, their desire to offer him a fête de reception of the same character as those which they have on former occasions had the honour to give to the Sultan, the Khedive, the Prince of Wales, and other Imperial and Royal personages.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHTS.—The music plates and copyrights of the late Mr. Thomas Oliphant were sold on Saturday last. The following were the more important:—J. L. Hatton—The Hunt is up (Tantarra); four-part song; Twilight, song; Hope, song; Autumn Reflections, song; Meeting and Parting, song; and Simon the Cellarer, song—41*l.* (J. Williams). J. L. Hatton—The Wreck of the Hesperus, 82*l.* 10*s.* (ditto). R. E. Pearsall—Great God of love (for eight voices); Who shall win my lady fair, a four-part song—85*l.* 10*s.* (Novello). R. E. Pearsall—O who will o'er the Downs so free? chorus for male voices—366*l.* (Novello). R. E. Pearsall—The hardy Norseman's House of yore, four-part song—344*l.* (ditto).

Here is a scratch from the Grizzly of San Francisco—we want a Grizzly in England:—

"Why or wherefore does the management announce Speigler as from the Royal Theatre, Mannheim? He might as well be announced as from San José! But it is on a par with the usual arrogance of the Teutonic musician. To hail from the theatre of a German village of a few dozen inhabitants is supposed to be a diploma of merit sufficient to entitle him to the reverential appreciation of all mere American savages."

We have to notice a serious illustration of the decay of the modern drama—the national play of "Mr. Punch," as presented to the British public in the streets. The moral basis of this serio-comedy has been often criticised in the humour in which Archbishop Whately found fault with a nursery legend wherein he detected the spirit of intolerance towards an insect, "kicked down stairs" for refusing to take part in a devotional exercise. Our charge against some recent representations of "Punch" is of a graver character. "Mr. Punch" has deteriorated in language. He was formerly choice, if not select; now he occasionally speaks in terms as rude as those which might be employed by a living wife-beater and scoundrel. The degraded "Punch" is to be heard not only in low places, but in streets and squares, in which his outbursts of triumph necessitate his being summarily ordered from the doors. The subject is as well worth the consideration of the authorities as the famous Cabinet can-can at the Court Theatre; and we hope, attention having been called to the circumstance, the police will seize upon any future "Punch" who endeavours to attract an audience by descending to the level of a Thames bargeman.

A writer in the New York Orphœnist says:—

"Judging by twenty years' observation and attendance upon New York concerts, the majority of dilettanti seem to think that all a nation needs in order to become musical is a constant repetition of old works. Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Weber, Schumann, Liszt, and Wagner are repeated, and repeated, and REPEATED usque ad nauseam, because they have a monopoly of the programmes. But we would ask, how in the name of common sense we are ever to know whether we have composers of our own or not, unless we give them a hearing? It would be a poor specimen of an academy or college where the students where made only to repeat from Shakespere, Milton, and other great authors, without ever stimulating their intellects to produce an original speech or composition. How could we ever have boasted of Longfellow if he had merely copied Tennyson all his life? What claims upon the nation's respect could Church now have, if he had always copied Cole's paintings? And what possible claims can we as a nation present for a respectable musical reputation, when we persistently, consistently, and stupidly keep on rehearsing old orchestral works, or, at least almost entirely deny presentations of native ones, year after year, at the Philharmonic Society, at Theodore Thomas's concerts, and on other occasions when an orchestra can be heard?"

The Grizzly, of San Francisco, thus comments upon some operatic doings there:—

"As regards the putting of the piece on the stage, it was simply disgraceful to the theatre. The chorus was weak, especially in female voices; for the two or three elderly ladies who represent that department have no particular voices to speak of, and do not exert what they have. The orchestra, from paucity of numbers, is simply ridiculous. The stage business and groupings were 'any which way,' everyone knocking against the other, and nobody knowing 't'other from which,' but all mingling in inextricable confusion. The military band, too, on the stage, which is as essential a feature of the opera as the prima donna or tenor, was coolly omitted, and the wretched little orchestra of eighteen left to do double duty. Now, considering that the price of admission is virtually two dollars, and the principal artists are all cheap ones—'mighty poor preach and mighty poor pay,' as the old nigger said of his minister—we do think that the other requisites of the scene might be complied with. The celebrated march was ruined and undone for want of a band on the stage, which would not have cost more than sixty dollars at the utmost. Truly, Mulder, you know your public, you are not a great maestro, but you are a 'smart man.' The language of the opera was, as usual, a reminiscence of the Tower of Babel; but as the Dutchmen did not understand the Italian, and the Italians did not comprehend the German, and the few Americans present understood neither, but kept looking through their opera-glasses to see if Mrs. So-an'-so was in the house, we suppose it don't much matter."

VIENNA.—The second concert at the Imperial Operahouse was eminently successful, under the direction of Herr Herbeck. The principal feature in the programme was Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphonie. There were also fragments from Franz Schubert's opera, Fierabras, executed by the chorus, Mdlle. Dillner, Herren Adams, Krauss, Müller, Pirk, and Scaria. An air from Winter's Unterbrochenes Opferfest, sung by Herr Scaria, failed to produce any very favourable impression, being found antiquated and old-fashioned. Herr Wilhelmj performed several pieces on the violin, and the concert was brought to a close by Schubert's March in B, scored by the Abbate Franz Liszt.

BONN.—The Memorial Festival in honour of Robert Schumann is fixed to come off on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th June. The proceedings will be opened on the 17th by a Profestival, or Introductory Festival, when the Requiem of Johann Brahms will be performed. The other days will be devoted exclusively to Schumann. On the second day, the programme will consist of Paradies und Peri; on the third, it will comprise the Manfred Overture, the A minor Concerto for Pianoforte, several vocal pieces, the C major Symphony, Op. 61, and the Faust Scenes. On the fourth day, there will be a Matinée of Chamber Music, including the Stringed Quartet, Op. 41, No. 3; Andante and Variations for two Pianos, Op. 46; the celebrated Quintet, Op. 44; and various vocal pieces, not yet decided on. Herr Joachim and Herr von Wasielewski, Town Musical Director, will act as conductors; the solo artists will be Mesdames Clara Schumann, Joachim, Herren Stockhausen and A. Schulze (of Berlin). Engagements are pending with other artists of eminence. The stringed quartet will consist of Herren Joachim, L. Strauss (from London), Herr O. von Königslöw, and Herr Müller.

BAIREUTH.—The erection of the National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre is being actively pushed on for the moment. The funds, amounting at the end of last year to 104,400 florins, have been increased to 140,000 florins by the receipts of the concerts conducted by Herr R. Wagner in Germany. An immense sum, however, is still needed before the building can be completed and fitted up for use. How this can be obtained within a year is a mystery, despite the hopes founded upon the Wagner-Concerts in London. It is pretty evident to every unprejudiced and sensible person that the odds are greatly against there being any National-Festival-Stage-Play in 1874.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"REVERIE,"

POUR LE PIANOFORTE,

Par WILLIAM CRAWFORD,

Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"A Reverie for the pianoforte, composed by Wm. Crawford, is quiet and rather thoughtful, as its name would lead one to expect. The music is ornamented, it is true, but the broderie does not destroy the placid and tuneful character of the phrases. The key is mostly E flat major, and a modulation to the relative minor is immensely effective."—North British Daily Mail.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From the "Lancet," May 3.)

There is something exciting in the title of this book. We opened it with a feeling of interest and closed it with one of disappointment. The disappointment was as much with ourselves, perhaps, as with its author; for we have failed to realise its meaning. It is not that it is badly written, wanting in ability, or deficient, here and there, in germs of thought that are capable of expansion and application; but there is an ambiguity about the book which excites without satisfying the curiosity. It is not an imaginative work, to charm us like the Coming Race. The moral does not lie on the surface, and the author has succeeded in effectually hiding his satire, if satire there be. On the other hand, if it is intended, as we conceive, to have a practical aim, that aim, although it is obvious enough in many places, escapes us altogether in some, and is dimly discerned in others. If the work lacks the wit of Gulliver's Travels, it is perfectly free from its coarseness. The people to whom the fragments relate are not only human, but constituents of a highly civilized and even polished society. Their actions about many things correspond to ours, and the objects they pursue are the same as those sought by terrestrial philanthropists. Health, education, marriage, the removal of disease, the prevention of madness and crime, the arts of government, the regulation of amusement, the efficient employment of physical forces, occupy the attention of the inhabitants of this Star City as they do that of our own; but the results of the studies widely differ. The name of "Montalluyah" immediately belongs to the chief city in the planet, but it may be also extended so as to include the entire sphere; and it is hinted that Montalluyah is in reality the world known to us as the planet Mars. The speaker in the "Fragments" was the son of one of the twelve kings, who, by his genius and worth, became "Tootmanyoso," or supreme ruler. Under his influence preventive medicine flourished; for the physicians, we are told, made it less their duty to cure than to prevent diseases. Electricity occupies the most prominent place among the physical agencies employed by these people. By its aid all sorts of things have been brought about, in the way of advancing the world in all that belongs to morality, science, and art. For increasing the power of optical instruments, for the detection and eradication of the germs of disease, and other purposes, electricity is the great agent. In Montalluyah everything organic or inorganic has an electricity of its own; and from a pet bird is extracted a pain-lulling electricity which has completely displaced all other methods for procuring anæsthesia, some of which, it is said, so seriously suspended the vital action that the patient died in consequence. Montalluyah is a capital place for physicians. They are persons of high rank there, live in palaces, and enjoy large revenues. Formerly called by a name answering to "disease doctors," they are now known as "health guardians." Parenthetically, we may remark that, as there are no poor, there is no necessity for the presence of Poor-law guardians. The perspiration and breath are examined by means of powerful microscopes. The chapters on education and character-divers and that on madness are good. In the latter we are told it has been discovered that it is not in the over-worked portion of the brain that the signs of disease have been found, but in those parts of the organ that have lain dormant or been little used. Persons rarely die but of old age in this other world, and man leaves it at last by aid of a material extracted from an insect, serene and happy as if about to start on a pleasant journey. A portion of this material is administered to the patient as soon as the physicians are satisfied that life is ebbing fast. The chapters on infants' exercise-machines, gymnastics, the discovery and use of the Allmanyuka, on consumption, and social intercourse, will have most interest for medical readers, and we must content ourselves by simply indicating their titles. In conclusion, the curious, fragmentary, yet withal clever book entitled "Another World" is, we are bound to say, written with a kind of verisimilitude that will interest readers, if it fails to realise their expectations.

* "Another World; or, Fragments from the Star City of Montalluyah." By Hermes. London: Samuel Tinsley. 1873.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

What has occurred since our last reference to the proceedings at this theatre may be briefly narrated. The Ballo in Maschera was produced, according to custom, early in the season. It had been announced that Madame Paoli would take the part of Amelia; but the new-comer being indisposed, Madame Saar, the German soprano, who may not be forgotten as a competent representative of high-tragedy characters, came forward as substitute, and did her very best; which best, under the circumstances, although Madame Saar is scarcely young enough for the character of Renato's erring wife, was in many instances to be highly commended. Signor Pavani, one of Mr. Gye's new tenors, with all his good qualities, is scarcely the Ricardo we have a right to expect; but the début of a new bass baritone, M. Maurel, a Frenchman, would alone have sufficed to impart interest to the performance of Verdi's characteristic opera. This gentleman has everything in his favour—a fine voice, a graceful and manly presence, and real dramatic intelligence. That M. Maurel's style of singing should be in a great measure French will naturally be taken for granted, but it is French of the legitimate stamp—like that of M. Faure, with which experienced and accomplished artist he has much in common. Enough for the present that M. Maurel, as may be gathered from what has been said, obtained and merited general acceptance. His performance was one of level excellence throughout. He raised a favourable impression from the beginning, which impression was enhanced as the opera went on, and rose to its height in the spontaneous applause awarded to his delivery of the soliloquy, "Sei tu che macchiavi quell'animo,"—with its tender and beautiful sequel, "O dolcezze perdute," which won a hearty and unanimous encore. Very much may fairly be expected from M. Maurel, perhaps as worthy a deputy for M. Faure—who has recently been singing in Belgium—as could easily be found. The other parts in Un Ballo were well distributed. Mdlle. Fossa was a piquant and lively page; Mdlle. Scalchi appeared as Ulrica, the sorceress; and Signors Tagliafico and Capponi, not for the first time, as chief conspirators. The general performance, under Signor Vianesi's direction, offered little room for criticism.

Besides repetitions of Lucia and the Africaine, there have been no less than three performances of the Sonnambula; but, with an Amina like Mdlle. Emma Albani, little cause for dissatisfaction could have been urged. On the second occasion this familiar opera was given in place of Rigoletto, which had been advertised, but, in consequence of the illness of Signor Cotogni, was not presented. The impression created by Mdlle. Albani more than confirmed the promise of her early appearances last season, when she made her début as Bellini's village heroine. The young Canadian is not only making sure but rapid steps towards the goal it is the ambition of every earnest artist to reach. We need not occupy the attention of our readers with a new description of a performance so frequently presented; and it will suffice to state that each of the conspicuous situations produced its accustomed effect—a climax, as is invariably the case, being attained by the subdued delivery of that pathetic apostrophe to the faded flowers, "Ah! non credea mirarti," and the brilliant execution of its joyous sequel, "Ah! non giunge uman pensiero," when the innocent sonnambulist finds herself restored once more to love and happiness. In Signor Nicolini Mdlle. Albani is associated with a worthy Elvino. Signor Bagagiolo plays Rodolfo; Mdme. Anese, Teresa; and Mdlle. Sassi, Lisa. Mdlle. Albani has also resumed the character of Lady Enrichetta, in Flotow's always popular Martha—associated with Mdlle. Scalchi, as Nancy; Signor Bettini, as Lionel; Signors Ciampi and Tagliafico, as Plumkett and Lord Tristan. To speak at any length about the performance of this well-known opera at Covent Garden, where it has been popular for so many years, would be superfluous. Few dramatic singers have given a prettier, more lively, and at the same time more natural and ingenuous portraiture of M. Flotow's engaging heroine than Mdlle. Albani; and it must be admitted that even fewer have sung that exquisite Irish melody, "Qui sola vergin rosa" ("The Last Rose of Summer"), with more tender and unaffacted expression. This—as well as the quartet at the spinning wheels—received the accustomed unanimous "encore." What more need be said about Martha, unless it be that Signor Bettini was encored in "M'appari tutt amor?" The opera was well received throughout, as it never fails to be when performed with tolerable efficiency, and as it could scarcely fail to be with Mdlle. Albani as Martha.

The second performance of Faust e Margherita brought forward a new Mephistopheles in Signor Nannetti, who possesses a good bass-baritone voice and considerable stage experience. He also "makes up" effectively for the character, having said which we have no more to say just now. Neither of the songs of Mephistopheles—"Di deli'or" nor the mocking serenade under Margaret's window—evoked the sensation the public has been accustomed to by other representatives of the part. But we, in England, have become somewhat fastidious with regard to Mephistopheles; and no wonder. Mdlle. Smeroschi's Margaret still more emphatically suggested comparisons; and we shall merely add that there were good features in her performance, both in a vocal and dramatic sense—especially in the later scenes of the opera, where force rather than delicacy is essential. On the whole, Mdlle. Smeroschi is overtaxed—not only by Goethe but by M. Gounod. M. Maurel. who, owing to the continued illness of Signor Cotogni, played Valentine, was in almost all respects admirable. His death scene after the combat with Faust, was very striking, and wanted nothing but moderation in the depiction of the final struggles to be exempt from criticism. Signor Nicolini again appeared as Faust; and the other parts were in the same hands as on the occasion noticed some time since, when Mdlle. Amalia Fossa was the Margaret.

About the most recent performance of Rossini's magnificent Guillaume Tell there is little to say. The overture, finely executed under Signor Vianesi's direction, was unanimously encored. M. Maurel made another step in public esteem by his assumption of the character of the hero; and, notwithstanding that the music is occasionally too low for his voice, his generally artistic execution could not be too much admired. The pathetic address to Jemmy, before obeying the cruel mandate of Gessler (Signor Tagliafico), to shoot the apple from his son's head, was, in the hands of M. Maurel, a genuine masterpiece of expressive singing and declamation. A very young lady, of prepossessing appearance—Mdlle. Sebel—took the part of Jemmy, and only wanted vocal power to do justice to it—more particularly in the concerted music. The other characters were entrusted to Mdlle. Scalchi (Eudige); Madame Sinico (Mathilde)—an artist who does credit to whatever she undertakes; Signor Tagliafico (Gessler); Signor Bagagiolo "of the voice" (Walter); Signor Edardi (the fisherman); Signor Fallar (Melchtal); Signor Raguer (Lentoldo); and Signor Rossi (Rodolpho). There was, however, one terrible drawback. Signor Urio, the tenor, who was cast for Arnoldo, the most important part in the opera, was suffering so severely from cold and relaxed throat, that the great duet with Tell, in the first act, in which occurs the famous apostrophe, "Ah! Mathilde!", instead of creating the usual enthusiasm, was virtually hissed by the unsuspecting occupants of the galleries and amphitheatre, whose custom is to besiege the theatre whenever Guillaume Tell is announced. Before the curtain rose for the next act an apology was made for Signor Urio, which did not appear to give unequivocal satisfaction. The great duet between Mathilde and Arnoldo, and the still greater trio, in which Tell and Walter win over a much desired confederate to the cause in which both are interested, were omitted; and, at the end of the third act, the curtain fell, to rise no more that evening. Nevertheless, it was not altogether the fault of poor Signor Urio. Though, perhaps, showing a certain amount of unwarrantable boldness in attempting a part which, since the first production of Guillaume Tell, has baffled the physical powers and sorely tried the musical skill of all but the most deeply studied and expert of dramatic singers, he has at least a right to question the judgment of those who permitted him to undertake the task. Afflicted with an indisposition the most inimical of all to the unfettered exhibition of a vocalist's art, Signor Urio was, moreover, not unnaturally, prostrate with nervousness. On that account, while admitting that such a contretemps should hardly, under any circumstances, be possible at so great an establishment as the Royal Italian Opera, we think the noisy expressions of discontent (chiefly from the galleries, be it understood) were in some measure unfair, if not absolutely cruel.

Guillaume Tell was repeated on Thursday evening—with Signor Mongini ("by kind permission of Mr. Mapleson"?), as Arnoldo, in lieu of Signor Urio. Meanwhile, M. Faure has returned from Belgium, and has already appeared in his celebrated part of Mephistopheles. The opera announced for Saturday is Linda di Chamouni, with Mdlle. Albani (first time) as the heroine. On Tuesday Mdme. Adelina Patti makes her first appearance—as Rosina, in the Barbiere di Siviglia (of course).

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

The prevalence of "light sopranos" has given to Lucia and La Sonnambula a place in advance of Il Trovatore; but whenever our old friend with the horrible plot comes to the front, the public are there with a hearty welcome. Thus it was on Saturday night, a full house greeting the familiar characters of Verdi's opera with all the warmth excited by recollections of past enjoyment. Lès extrêmes se touchent, and the flavour of unmitigated horror appears to give the keenest delight. Mdlle. Tietjens was as powerful as ever in the character of Leonora, not a chance being lost of proving that she remains at the head of dramatic sopranos, with the rest, comparatively speaking, nowhere. In consequence of Mdme. Trebelli's illness, the part of Azucena was undertaken, at a few hours' notice, by Mdlle. Macvitz, who may fairly claim immunity from the censure due to whatever faults were apparent. The young contralto could not be expected to throw on the old gipsy's character as readily as she "made up" for the part, and we shall limit our remarks to a record of the promising manner in which some of Azucena's music was rendered. Signor Mongini sang "Ah! si ben mio," and declaimed "Di quella pira" in his best style, adding thereby to the meagre list of successes achieved by him during the present season. An uproarious encore appropriately followed the robust tenor's vigorous effort. The Conte di Luna was Signor del Puente, who sustained the part with much credit, and showed himself a capable and useful artist. Wanting a clear and resonant voice, this gentleman may not take the highest position, but his intelligence and general qualifications cannot fail to make him valuable. The opera was given with smoothness and efficiency throughout.

Madame Trebelli's illness caused the substitution of Lucia for Semiramide on Monday night; but on Tuesday the popular French contralto was able to take part in Marta, which pleasant, melodious work had been chosen for the rentrée of Signor Campanini. The Italian tenor, whose advent last season gave rise to hopes not wholly justified by results, met with a hearty welcome, and the encouraging cheers of the house stimulated him to really painstaking efforts. Signor Campanini is not always alike, being sometimes as perfunctory as he is at other times zealous. The zealous fit was on him last Tuesday, and the consequence was success of a marked description. His voice, though not in perfect order, fell short of that desirable state only a little way, and on no former occasion has Signor Campanini used it with greater effect. The keynote of good fortune was struck in Lionel's first cantabile, "Solo, profugo," which well served to show the artist's voice and style, and thence to the end he had the applause of the house at command. Nobody will accuse the Fates of injustice because of this. Signor Campanini may not be a phenomenal tenor, but, as tenors go, it is no small thing to have in him one whose agreeable voice, artistic phrasing, and spirited acting recall, if they do not absolutely repeat, the excellences of a richer operatic time. It is scarcely necessary to add that "M'appari" was encored with enthusiasm. The Marta of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, the Nancy of Madame Trebelli, the Plumket of Signor Agnesi, and the Tristan of Signor Borella are too well known for comment. "Qui sola vergin rosa" (Mdlle. di Murska) and the "Beer song" (Signor Agnesi) received the usual encore, and the performance, as a whole, was satisfactory.

COPENHAGEN.—A new opera, The Corsican, by E. Hartmann, has been produced, but with only moderate success. M. Gounod's Faust, on the contrary, has proved a trump-card for the management of the Theatre Royal, and draws crowded houses every time it is played.

MUNICH.—A most impressive performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew was recently given by the Musical Academy. The solo singers were Mesdames Diez and Mangstl, Herren Vogl, Niklittschek, and Fr. Thomas.

MACREADY.

One more "well-graced actor" has quitted this life's stage, William Charles Macready, the traditions of whose genius survive now only in the person of his disciple, Mr. Phelps. In the eighty-first year of his age, full of fame, a favourite in both hemispheres, a true translator of Shakesperian idea, the last, it may be said, of his generation, this master of a most difficult and envied art, who had long resigned his place upon the boards to younger aspirants, but who had gathered laurels sufficient for any ambition in that particular sphere, passed away on Sunday. With him, it may almost be added, dies a type and a school. His career, like that of so many others belonging to the profession of the sock and buskin, was, in the beginning, crowded with chances, accidents, and vicissitudes. His father could scarcely claim any rank above that of an itinerant manager, but he gave the son, nevertheless, a public-school training, intending him, after Rugby, for Oxford. But affairs went badly at the time with the Macreadys, and, fortunately for our tragic drama, William Charles was compelled to wear its mask. His earliest appearance was as Romeo; his latest, if we remember aright, was in the same character, when, after formally retiring, he gave his services for the benefit of an old friend. The one performance, at 17, was at Birmingham; the other, at 60, was in Church Street, Marylebone. Then, with Kean and Kemble as rivals, and inexperience to embarrass him, he fought his uphill way; was compelled to sit outside the gates of Shakespere, and satisfy himself with the mediocrity of Sheridan Knowles; had to sustain parts which he despised; and yet pushed his way as actor, as manager, as a chieftain on the stage, until, with precocious temerity, he had two of the principal theatres in London upon his hands, and, of course, was stranded among complications. These determined him upon a professional enterprise in the United States. Twice, indeed, he visited that region, that second Russia, the paradise of fortune-hunting singers and players. Once, it will be remembered, in 1849, owing to an outburst of jealousy on the part of Mr. Forrest at New York, there was a desperate riot at the Astor Opera House in that city, when the military had to be called out, and twenty-two persons were killed, besides many wounded. Few men of his class, abroad or at home, were more popular; few had higher honours lavished upon them. William Charles Macready maintained from first to last the dignified reputation which he invariably claimed for the drama and its representatives, and these in his death have endured an irreparable loss. His, too, was a long life of ardent work. Professionally, he originally appeared in 1810; professionally, he was last seen in 1851, at the Haymarket—forty years and more of untiring energy. Then he took his farewell, impersonating Macbeth; and, as we have suggested, with the exception of Mr. Phelps, he left no Shakesperian successor, unless we allow his opinion of the younger Kean to have been a prejudice, and his overlooking of Mr. Anderson a mistake. All literature, all art, all fashion, crowded to the farewell of the grand actor who had burst from the fetters of Orestes, of William Tell, and of Caius Gracchus, to be a breathing Hamlet, a Lear, a Macbeth, a Richard, and a Cæsar, on the stage. When the curtain descended that night—February 26, 1851—at Drury Lane, the public knew that a bright star of the drama had disappeared. Macready then said, and with truth, that he was retiring in perfect consciousness of vigour and intelligence; he preferred to quit the scene before his honours faded upon it; he would not prolong his endeavours until time had rendered them abortive. So thus in the maturity, not in the decay of his powers, William Charles Macready saluted the public, of which he was an acknowledged favourite, for, with one exception, we think, the last time; that is to say, upon the theatrical stage—the field of his triumphs. For only a few days later there was gathered around him such a concourse of keen and yet congratulatory critics as might have made any man proud—Lytton, Dickens, Thackeray, and John Forster among them. This man had fought his way through a strife in which invidious feelings abounded. His earlier career was exclusively provincial; Kean saw his début, and spoke of it kindly. Kemble and Young, when he threw down his gauntlet at Covent Garden, were almost exclusive favourites of the town. Two patent theatres monopolised the Shakesperian drama. No new comers were permitted to trespass or poach, and thus Macready became at first a Rob Roy, a Mirandola, a Virginius; but he speedily had his revenge. He took, with much pecuniary detriment to himself and others, the two patent theatres already spoken of. He assumed the costumes of Shakespeare. He studied in Paris; he practised in America; and upon returning home, lived down envy itself. His regretted, though not unexpected, death certainly marks an era in our dramatic annals. It will be followed, no doubt, by many criticisms from admirers and depreciators; since, thirty years ago, there was a war of opinions around this venerable name: on the one side it was asserted that he represented "legitimacy;" on the other, that he was the personification of an obsolete style. Apart from this controversy; an admission must be made. Like many other actors, Macready could rarely bear a rival near his throne; wandering from theatre to theatre he was almost perpetually surrounded by puppets, reserving the real stage for himself. Still, allowing for these frailties of that ambition, always, in this peculiar department, so tenacious and jealous, we shall miss, with him, a host of brilliant associations. Macready, moreover, was not altogether a man of the past; of the "high and palmy days," concerning which he used to speak; he constituted, rather, a link between the older and the newer styles of his art. Like most actors, he regarded his predecessors with respect: but, unlike most actors, he submitted to no conventional laws; hence he made his art his own, and surprised many a secret of expression and action, which helped to create his fame. Rarely did he descend to a stage trick; seldom did he stoop to the hollow traditions of "the wing;" he thought, indeed, that acting required personal genius, and what genius he had—which was not small—he threw into his labour. It was a favourite saying of his, "I want to illustrate, not a type, but an individuality." He resisted the temptation to emulate the declamatory triumphs of the Kembles, and endeavoured in a play, however romantic or tragic—not that he invariably succeeded—to speak, in some degree, as a man of the ordinary world. When he said that he "spoke blank verse like domestic conversation" he boasted of that which is impossible; still the tendency was in the right direction. He never lost the spirit of the poetry he was uttering; he never missed the idiosyncracy of the character he was representing; he always studied the meaning of his author, no matter to what date or country belonging; and he toiled, indefatigably, with a true fidelity, in his vocation. We need not speak of this as an utterly unselfish love of the drama. All artists love to see themselves—or their genius, which is the same thing—reflected in their works. So, in the arrangement of a play, the whole picturesque and dramatic elements, the entire light of the drama, indeed, centred round and radiated from Macready's own voice and person. Yet he never distorted texts for his individual advantage: he would not spoil a rival's "point" unless it clashed with his own; he seldom flashed with impetuous inspirations, but he sustained his acting with a steady power possessed by few of his contemporaries. In endeavouring thus to appreciate the octogenarian actor's merits and demerits, we trust we have kept in view the salient characteristics of his professional career; yet there are a few words remaining to be said concerning the singular latent vein of quaint and pungent humour visible, sometimes, even through his tragedy, occasionally mingled with a tone of sarcasm, and now and then breaking out even in such impersonations as those of Joseph Surface, Mr. Oakley, and Benedict—three very different personages, as will be admitted. But now this veteran has gone from among us, and, as we have said, there is only one to emulate, while probably there are none to replace him. Whatever may be the opinions of those who survive him as to his place amongst English actors, their sentiment now will, undoubtedly, be of one kind—the sentiment of a grateful memory for a man who rendered such high service to his art.

DARMSTADT.—The programme of the last Philharmonic Concert for this season included Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's "Frühlingssymphonie;" Castel's overture to Semiramis; and Franz von Holstein's overture to Der Haideschacht. Mdlle. Schuts played a "Nocturne" by Chopin, and an "Etude" by Stephen Heller. Herr Meyer sang the grand air from the first act of Mozart's Idomeneo

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

The interesting and instructive concerts given daily in Albert Hall, under Mr. Barnby's direction, and in association with Her Majesty's Commissioners, continue to sustain the high character established at first. During the past week a good deal of attractive music has been performed. In the earlier programmes were Weber's fine overture to Oberon, Beethoven's Symphony in C (No. 1), "The Dance of Reapers," from Sullivan's music to The Tempest, and the overture to Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito, the opera written for the Emperor Leopold's coronation in 1791. We have but rare chances of hearing the last-named work, although in point of grace and beauty it is one of Mozart's best orchestral pieces; and Mr. Barnby satisfactorily carries out the promise of his prospectus when he presents amateurs with music so long and undeservedly neglected. The May-day programme was very fittingly chosen. It began with Méhul's overture to La Chasse de Jeune Henri, brightest and most picturesque of hunting pieces. This work, too, is rarely heard, for reasons which those who, on Thursday, listened to its merry strains, full of the animation and freedom of nature, were by no means able to appreciate. Next came Hiller's Symphony in E minor, with the motto, "It must soon be spring." We had something to say about this elaborate and interesting work when it was produced at the Crystal Palace, and it will be enough now to state that renewed acquaintance led to enhanced pleasure. The esteemed Professor of Cologne has produced little more worthy of the reputation he enjoys than the Symphony which depicts the conflict between stern winter and genial spring. This was followed by Julius Rietz's Lustspiel overture—a work full of interest, and productive of a desire to know more about its composer. Rietz has written several orchestral symphonies, and we hope that Mr. Barnby will enable English amateurs to make the acquaintance of one or more of them during the series of concerts. Mdlle. Gips, a soprano of promise, gave variety to some of the week's concerts by her rendering of, among other things, a song by Schumann, and Rossini's "Di piacer." The works performed this week have included Herold's Pré aux Clercs overture, Mozart's Symphony in D, and his Concerto for piano in C (No. 14), played by Mr. W. H. Thomas, to whose performance we shall return.

SIGNOR AND MDME. GUSTAVE GARCIA IN DEVONSHIRE.

There was a large and fashionable attendance at Signor Gustave Garcia's benefit concert, at the Northernhay Rooms. The programme was varied and inviting. Signor Garcia has been known in Devonshire for years as a successful teacher of music, and the choir consisted principally of his pupils. The manner in which they acquitted themselves reflected equal credit upon the talent of the instructor and the aptitude of his pupils. They sang with spirit and precision, and although their powers at times were severely taxed, there was hardly a hitch in any of their performances. Their best effort was Gounod's part-song, "Go, lovely Rose." It was beautifully rendered, and nothing could be more telling than the careful attention to the contrasts of light and shade. The feature of the evening, however, was the singing of Mdme. Garcia. This lady possesses a voice of great power, richness of tone and flexibility, added to which she has a charming style. She first gave Benedict's "Rock me to sleep," a beautiful air, which she rendered with exquisite taste and feeling. The canzona, "Siam iti," by Gounod, gave her an opportunity of displaying her remarkable powers in a totally different line. In both these Mdme. Garcia was encored. One of the prettiest pieces was the Spanish duet, "La Jota," by Yradier, sung by Signor and Mdme. Garcia, and enthusiastically re-demanded. Signor Garcia gave Verdi's romanza, "Eri tu," from Un Ballo in Maschera, and Rossini's tarantella, "La Danza." He possesses a powerful tenor voice, and uses it with the skill of a master. Both songs were warmly applauded. One of the Signor's pupils displayed her powers as a soloist, and was very successful. She sang Rossini's "Selva opaca," with taste and expression, profiting by the excellent training she had received. Mr. G. Hirtzel gave "Abraham's Request," by Gounod, very effectively. Miss Smith played two solos on the pianoforte—the Study, in A minor, by Thalberg, and Chopin's "Grand Valse," No. 6, Op. 42. Signor Garcia himself conducted, and he wielded the bâton with the power of a finished practician. Mr. Osmond, organist of St. Mary's Church, Torquay, was the accompanist. Signor Garcia may be congratulated upon his success, for the audience dispersed thoroughly pleased and charmed with the evening's entertainment.

GAIETY THEATRE.

An agreeable variety has been imparted to the programme of this theatre by the revival of Daniel Terry's popular dramatic adaptation of Sir Walter Scott's novel of Guy Mannering, which, chiefly through its association with the original music composed for the play by Sir Henry Bishop, has kept possession of the stage for more than half a century. Besides awakening a host of old memories among the elder portion of the audience, this three-act musical drama, representing a kind of dramatic entertainment utterly unknown to the modern play-going generation, should attract attention for the general care bestowed on the reproduction and the efficiency of the principal performers. The songs which fall to the share of Miss Annie Sinclair as Julia Mannering are rendered with much taste and feeling, and "Tell me, my heart," introduced on the authority of several of her predecessors, gained a well-merited encore. Miss Alice Cook, as Lucy Bertram, gives the traditional ballad, "Oh, slumber, my darling," with appropriate simplicity; and Mr. F. Wood, as Henry Bertram, renders effective assistance in the "Echo duet," and in the song, "Be mine, dear maid." The gipsy, Gabriel, has a very fitting representative in Mr. Aynsley Cook, who would probably justify his interpretation of "The Wolf" by a reference to the repetition which the audience instantly demanded; and the glee and chorus, "The Chough and Crow," receives a very adequate interpretation from the vocal portion of the company. Mr. H. Sinclair is a characteristic Dandie Dinmont, though we can hardly afford to spare "Without a companion what's life but a death;" and Mr. Lionel Brough as the pedantic Dominie Sampson, Mr. H. R. Teesdale as Colonel Mannering, and Mrs. H. Leigh as Meg Merrilees, satisfactorily fill up the remainder of the cast. The new operatic extravaganza of Martha maintains its position as an amusing afterpiece.

THE LATE MR. AUGUSTUS HARRIS.

In appropriate recognition of the many services rendered by the late Mr. Augustus Harris to lyric art, during his long connection with the management of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, Mr. Gye, as we have already stated, has granted the free use of that establishment for a special performance, which is arranged to take place on Wednesday, May 21, for the benefit of the family of that much-lamented gentleman. Although snatched away at a comparatively early age, Mr. Harris must not be supposed to have left in necessitous circumstances those towards whom he always displayed the utmost care and affection; but the proposed benefit will partake more of the nature of a memorial, preserving a recollection of the indefatigable zeal and artistic care which he has displayed for more than a quarter of a century in his responsible position as stage manager. All the members of the Royal Italian Opera Company have, we understand, spontaneously offered their services, and that distinguished vocalist, Mdme. Adelina Patti, will, we have little doubt, on her arrival in England, offer her invaluable aid. Many members of the English theatres will, we anticipate, be equally anxious to proffer assistance, less for the reason that any additional attraction will be required, than for the reason that they will generally feel this mark of respect is fairly due to a truly honourable and kindly-hearted gentleman, with whom most of them have come into agreeable contact during some portion of their professional career. A crowded house may be confidently anticipated on the occasion, not merely in consideration of the strong claims upon public attention possessed by the one who has been so abruptly taken from us, but in remembrance of those he has left behind, whom he so assiduously and affectionately regarded, and by whom he was so dearly and so deservedly beloved.—Daily Telegraph.

THE JUBILEE SINGERS.

Under this title the London public will make the acquaintance of a troop of real negro minstrels, whose musical performances are destined to take a prominent position among the attractions of the season. The "Jubilee Singers" are a band of black vocalists—four males, and seven females—nearly all of them emancipated slaves. They are students connected with Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee, one of seven chartered institutions established in the United States by the American Missionary Association, "aiming to give the freedmen a higher and Christian education, so that the most gifted among them can be fitted to become the teachers and the leaders of their race in America, the West India Islands, and Africa." For the past year and a half they have been giving their entertainment in the Northern States, and the object of their voyage across the Atlantic is to raise money enough to build a "jubilee hall," the first permanent building of Fisk University, for which, £14,000 are required, and of which sum £8,000 have been already secured. The private concert, given at Willis's Rooms on Tuesday, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, who briefly explained the purpose of the professional visit, more than justified the recommendations with which the "Jubilee Minstrels" come accredited. In the presence of a fashionable audience, these negro vocalists with their simple minstrelsy, produced an effect which not one among the assemblage is likely soon to forget. The hushed attention and the frequently moistened eye were perhaps to be regarded as more valuable tributes to the power they exercised than the unusually vehement plaudits which invited a repetition of nearly every piece set down in the programme. It may be safely asserted that nothing like the plantation songs of these "Jubilee Singers" has been before heard in this country. Their rich, clear, bell-like tones, the eminently sympathetic quality of their voices, and the perfect, rhythmical flow of their melodies, however broken and seemingly irregular the movement of the music, will command unqualified admiration; and, while the connoisseur will note with interest some of the peculiarities of these simple compositions, the most ordinary auditor will derive an enjoyment from hearing the "Jubilee Singers," which will at least afford the luxury of an entirely new sensation. Yesterday afternoon they went to Argyll Lodge, and there performed before a distinguished party, which included the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, and Dean Stanley. While the entertainment was proceeding the Queen came to the Lodge, and the Minstrels had the honour of singing several songs before her. Her Majesty expressed gratification with what she heard.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

Barbe-Bleue, La Grande Duchesse, and Perrenche produced, and all repeated, during the last week, brought our season to a close.

Of the Barbe-Bleue what can I say? There was a crowded house on each occasion of its performance, the music toujours Offenbach, was indifferently rendered by the orchestra. Madame Champenois, however, sang the couplets in the second act with taste and spirit, and elicited hearty applause. M. Fronty, pour ses adieux, had to respond to three recalls after the scene from Hamlet. It is a pity that the story of Blue Beard has been so mutilated to serve the purposes of an opera. Fancy the tale of one's youth without a Sister Ann! No!—it's too bad! And the morale of the piece!!!

La Grande Duchesse, played twice, went very well. M. Laurent was Fritz; but Madame Geraldine, as the Grande Duchesse, over-acted the part.

For the last night of the season the production of a new opéra-comique, in one act, "par deux amateurs de la ville," produced some effect. The title is Perrenche, which, translated into English, is Periwinkle (a flower); botanically, Vinca Major; vulgarly, Periwinkle, the latter suggesting the 5 p.m. "tea-time" of one's early youth, when such were partaken of by means of a brass pin and a sharp twist of the wrist outwards—subsequent dyspepsia, (possibly augmented by the recapitulation of the story of Blue Beard, with a Sister Ann,) making a finale in the shape of the exhibition of tongues to the family doctor, and the curtain falling on "The powder to be taken at bed-time."—(N.B., in jam.) But "revenous à non moutons!"—"Perrenche" is the name of a young lady deserted by her nurse in a wood, and laid by that virtuous person on a cluster of periwinkles (the flower, not the shell-fish!). She was found there by a farmer, and she has arrived at twenty years of age when the piece begins. Of course the farmer has a son who loves her, and there is a villain who wants her for her money, and her father turns up in the shape of a millionaire. However, the farmer's son "claims her for his own," obtains her, and, I suppose, "they live happily ever after." Mdlle. Noaille took the part of "Perrenche," and sang the music with much taste. She was in better voice than I have previously heard her, and was especially good in a little chansonette, "Un berger disait à Collette." M. Kinnel was the philanthropic farmer, and M. Lodève (a most useful member of the Boulogne troupe), the son; while Baptiste, the villain, was represented by M. Gérald. Altogether, Perrenche, "opéra-comique" as it is styled, consists of nothing but a lot of waltzes and familiar airs strung together. Being, however, "native talent," it was naturally much applauded. To-morrow we have a representation "au benefice de M. et Dames des chœurs," when "spectacle and concert" will be given. Next week I hope to send you a résumé of the last season.

You will be pleased to hear that your compatriot, the English doctor, Sydney Chater, has been at length dubbed a Doctor by the French Government for his services during the late war, and is now "licensed to practice as a physician among English and French."

ROSSINI'S POSTHUMOUS WORKS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Parisian correspondent of the Fanfulla gives some interesting particulars concerning the unpublished works of Rossini, just sold by his widow to Mr. Grant. The entire collection numbers 150 pieces. The original character and satirical turn of mind of the maestro are evidenced in the titles of several of them, which were composed for himself and a few friends. A great many of the pieces, in fact nearly all, are for the piano. The following are some of the titles:—"Spécimen de mon temps et de l'avenir," a parody on the Wagnerian style. Into this piece Rossini has thrown all his power and knowledge. "La Pésarèse," a characteristic piece of dance-music, in recollection of his birth-place; "La Couronne d'Italie," a fanfare on his nomination as Commander of that order; "Le Regatte Veneziane" and "La Lagune de Venise," two elegant pieces dedicated by Rossini to the city in which he experienced his first triumphs and his first disappointments; "La Nuit de Noël;" "Adieu à la Vie," on a single note; "Valse lugubre," a piece which brings tears into the eyes of those who hear it; "Un mot à Paganini," the only violin piece in the collection; two original albums, the one bearing the title of Les Mendiants, and containing four pieces: "Les Figues" ("Me voilà, Madame"), "Les Amandes" ("Minuit sonne, bon soir, Madame"), "Les Noisettes" ("A ma petit chienne"), and "Les Raisins" ("A ma petite peruche"); the other is called "Les hors-d'œuvre," and, like the first, contains four pieces, the first names of which are "Cornichons," "Beurre," "Radis," and "Crevettes;" "Ultimo ricordo," a romance written by Rossini a week before his death, and dedicated to his wife; 24 pieces entitled "Riens," but sufficient in themselves to make the reputation of a composer and a pianist; "I Titani," a piece for four basses, performed in 1868; the "Inno a Napoleone III," performed "with cannon," at the Exhibition of 1867; the already celebrated, but still unpublished "Tarentella" for pianoforte; a "Memento, homo," said to be a masterpiece; "La passeggiata," for four voices; other pieces with eccentric titles such as: "Mon prélude hygiénique du matin," "La valse à l'huile de ricin," and "Un petit train de plaiser comico-imitatif." Lastly there is a piece, "alla Offenbach," written exclusively for the fore-finger and little-finger.

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON.

Madame Christine Nilsson made her first appearance for the season at Her Majesty's Opera on Tuesday evening, and was honoured with a greeting as enthusiastic as the most admired of singers could possibly expect or desire. How great a favourite the Swedish lady has been for some years with the English public need hardly be stated; and had there been any doubt of it that doubt would have been set at rest on Tuesday, when every phrase and passage that came from the lips of the songstress was listened to with eager interest, and applauded in proportion by an audience that crowded the house in every part.

The opera selected for the occasion was the Faust of M. Gounod, who, with this one work, which enjoys, and deservedly, a world-wide reputation, has, alone among French composers, been able to make head against the Bellinis, Donizettis, Verdis, &c., whose compositions, for years too many to count, have in a great degree monopolised our Italian lyric stage. Margaret has always been one of Madame Nilsson's favourite characters; and though her delineation differs in many respects from that of other artists of renown, it exhibits characteristics which may fairly challenge criticism on the strength of what, on the whole, must be regarded as an original conception. True, it seems to many to be rather the Margaret of Ary Scheffer than the Gretchen of the German poet; but in being so it more uniformly consorts with the idea of the character as set forth in M. Gounod's expressive and fascinating music. Judged from this point of view, the Margaret of Madame Christine Nilsson is perfect in its way; while, judged from no matter what point of view, it is, from beginning to end, a highly-finished performance.

Madame Nilsson's voice, on Tuesday, was in first-rate condition, and none of the striking points were missed. That the liveliest impression was created by the brilliant air in which, attracted by the jewels, the innocent Gretchen is for the first time awakened to a sense of vanity, will be taken for granted. This was encored with the utmost warmth and unanimity.

Signor Campanini played Faust; the Mephistopheles was Signor Castlemary, a new comer, of whom we shall take another opportunity to speak; Mdlle. Macvitz was the Siebel, Mdlle. Bauermeister the Martha, and Signor Mendioroz gave one of the very best representations we have witnessed of the character of Valentine. The general performance, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, was excellent throughout.

TIETJENS' THIRD LEONORA.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

The announcement that Mdlle. Tietjens would appear "for the first time at Her Majesty's Opera" as the Leonora of La Favorita; that Fernando would be represented by a new tenor, Signor Aramburo; and that Donizetti's fine work would have all the advantage of a new mise-en-scène, attracted a large audience to Drury Lane last Thursday week. As the public have recently been accustomed to strange tenors, and fine stage effects are no novelty, it is fair to assume that the crowd came together, for the most part, to witness Mdlle. Tietjens' assumption of her third Leonora. Had the Fates been endowed with foresight they would assuredly have given the name of Leonora to the grand artist who, in Il Trovatore and Fidelio, has borne it for many years with a success not often surpassed in the annals of lyric drama. Mdlle. Tietjens might well have been content with the renown accruing from her achievements as the heroine of Verdi and of Beethoven; but there remained the Leonora of Donizetti, and, though the time was somewhat late, she determined upon adding it to her list. That determination last Thursday week saw carried out with a success which not only justified the artist's confidence in her resources, but also showed how surpassing talent can neutralize the force of disadvantages impossible to remove. There never could have been a question of Mdlle. Tietjens' vocal and dramatic success in the part, whatever doubts were entertained as to minor matters. She is always the great singer, whose noble voice and exalted style become more striking by contrast with the abounding "light sopranos" of the present time. And she is always the great dramatic artist, to whom belong the classic rôles of opera, and who, in them, reigns supreme. Thus qualified, the assumption of Donizetti's Leonora was an easy task, and its success a foregone conclusion. Knowledge of this fact gave extra warmth to the cheers with which Mdlle. Tietjens was received, and placed the "house" in perfect sympathy with her efforts. It can hardly be necessary to dwell upon the manner in which Leonora's music was rendered. Although not adapted to display Mdlle. Tietjens' voice to the best advantage, that music afforded many an opportunity of showing her consummate vocal skill, and not a chance of the kind was wasted. From "O, mio Fernando" down to the least significant phrase of recitative, Mdlle. Tietjens did her work with a completeness none could gainsay, singing like a true artist, and winning an artist's truest honours.

But Mdlle. Tietjens' chief success arose from the completeness and power with which she assumed the character of the unhappy heroine. From the time when Leonora met Fernando in the palace gardens till she died in his arms at the foot of the cross, it was Leonora, and not Mdlle. Tietjens, who moved upon the stage, so completely did the artist identify herself with the part. Remarkable every way, the impersonation was in nothing more remarkable than in its skilful observance of climax. Mdlle. Tietjens did not waste intensity in the earlier scenes, though she never fell short of their requirements. Effective at the moment when the anathema of the Church is hurled upon Leonora, she was yet more effective when Fernando repudiates, at the same time, his master's favours and his king's mistress. The passionate, yet unexaggerated acting of Mdlle. Tietjens in this scene roused the house to enthusiasm; but it was the last scene of all that showed the full extent of her powers. Nothing could have been more touching in its sense of utter desolation and inextinguishable love than the picture of Leonora as she reclined on the steps of the cross murmuring Fernando's name—nothing more startling in its anguish than her exclamation when she hears him utter the irrevocable vow. Thence to the end Mdlle. Tietjens was at her best, and the audience showed by every means in their power that they appreciated an effort of surpassing merit. The Leonora of our great dramatic soprano will be a prominent feature in the annals of the season.

GUGLIELMO FUND.

Signor Guglielmo, the author of "The Lover and the Bird," "Sing me that Song again," "La Camelia," "La Notte è bella," "T'Amo," and many other well-known musical compositions, had, till the year 1864, always been able, with the income derived from his profession—that of a teacher of singing—to maintain himself and family in respectability and comfort. In that year his voice, unfortunately, gave way, his professional income rapidly declined, and he was practically left dependent upon the profits arising from the sale of his compositions, which profits in their turn declined, owing to his pecuniary inability sufficiently to advertise. In the result he became embarrassed, and in 1870 was compelled to mortage the most productive of his works, to meet his then liabilities and immediate wants. In April, 1872, his misfortunes culminated in his becoming afflicted with a cancer in the month, from which, after much suffering, he died on the 20th of March, 1873, leaving his widow and five children—viz., Ludovico, Gabriel, Charles, Violetta, and Claude—dependent upon the exertions of the eldest son, Ludovico, who has adopted his father's profession, but whose income is wholly inadequate to such a burden. The Committee feel satisfied that the facts above stated only require to be brought to the notice of those who have long been familiar with Signor Guglielmo's name as a teacher and composer of music, to enable them to procure the means of alleviating the present distressing condition of his widow and children. The undermentioned gentlemen have agreed to act as a Committee for the purpose of raising and administering the fund:—

Illtudus T. Pritchard, Esq. (Treasurer), 57, Granville Park, Blackheath; Sir Julius Benedict; John Belcher, Jr. Esq.; Geo. Cary, Esq.; G. H. B. Hunt, Esq.; H. N. Lay, Esq., C.B.; C. Mackeson, Esq.; David Nasmith, Esq.; E. H. Turpin, Esq.

Subscriptions may be paid to the account of the "Guglielmo Fund," at the London and Westminster Bank, Temple Bar Branch, to any member of the Committee, or as directed by either of the newspapers kindly aiding the Committee. C. R. MacClymont, Hon. Sec.

4, Garden Court, Temple Bar.

Stuttgart.—The eighth Subscription Concert of the Royal Chapel (Hofkapelle) was peculiarly modern in character. It started off with a novelty, a Concert-Overture, by Emil Naumann, to the tragedy of Loreley. Another novelty was a Quartet composition, entitled "Nachtmusik," by Herr L. Stark, Professor at the Conservatory here. After this came Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, played by Herr Wehrle. Herr Schütky sang a sacred air by Stradella, and songs by Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann. The second part of the concert was filled up by Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor.

SHAKESPERE'S DRAMAS AND MUSIC.

Hamlet's "To be or not to be" was transformed into an opera by: Max Maretzek (1843 and 1844); Buzzola; Boito; Faccio; Hignard (1868); and Ambroise Thomas. The last Hamlet was produced for the first time at the Grand Opera, Paris, on the 9th March, 1868. The subject has been fashioned into an opera-book by Michel Carré and Jules Barbier as well as its nature would allow. The music contains many "sparks but no flame." The reader will not have forgotten the great triumph achieved by Mdlle. Nilsson as Ophelia; in fact, it was to her that the success of the opera was due.

Of Macbeth there exist three operas. The first is by H. Chelard (1789—1861), and was produced on the 29th June, 1827, in Paris. A. Gathy, in the Universal Encyclopedia of Musical Knowledge, says of it: "This work is a mixture of the French grand opera style and that of German romantic opera. It contains too many harsh effects." In 1847 there appeared Verdi's Macbeth, and on the 16th November, 1857, at Berlin, Wilhelm Taubert's. The latter's was one of his best works.

Of King Lear also there exist three operas, the composers being G. Verdi (1847), Schiwa, and Emil Sauvage.

The Tempest was turned into an opera partly under its original title, and partly under that of The Island of Spirits. It was set as The Tempest by Adam Joseph Emmert, for Salzburg, in 1806; by Peter von Winter, for Munich, about 1800; by Johann Heinrich Rolle, Jacques Elie Fromenthal Halévy, for London, about 1840; and by Naprawnik, a Russian, in 1867. Gotter's book was mostly used for The Island of Spirits. It was set by Friedrich Fleischmann, 1796; by Johann Rudolf Zumsteeg, in 1799; and by Friedrich Haak and Johann Friedrich Reichardt, in 1797. There is, also, an opera of this name by P. J. Riotte, and a four-act operetta by Joh. Daniel Hensel.

The Merry Wives of Windsor was made the subject of an opera by Ditters von Dittersdorf, 1796; by Peter Ritter, 1794; and by Otto Nicolai, the last composer's work being first produced in Berlin on the 9th March, 1849. A book founded on the same play, but under the name of Falstaff, was set by Atonio Salieri (Falstaff, ossia le tre Burle), 1798, Adolphe Adam, and Michael William Balfe.

A Midsummer Night's Dream was transformed into an opera by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (?), Ambroise Thomas, and Hermann Behrens.

We have a Merchant of Venice by Deffés; an Othello, by Rossini; a Beatrice et Bénédict (Much Ado about Nothing), by Hector Berlioz, 1861; a Perdita, by C. Barbieri, and a Hermione, by Max Bruch, the two latter works being taken from the Winter's Tale.

Under the title of Julius Cæsar there are operas by A. Sartorio, Fr. Cavallo and Fr. Handel, though perhaps they do not owe much to Shakespere's drama; and, under the name of Coriolanus, operas by Fr. Cavallo; Giac. Anton. Perti; Att. Ariosti; Nicolini; Caldara; and Lavigna, 1806.

Nor have Shakespere's dramas escaped having to pay a tribute to smaller musical compositions—interludes, and separate songs. This is not astonishing, for these things are treated in a more off-hand and flippant way than they ought to be. A composer fancies he has done enough in such cases if he has heaped up together a few odd-sounding chords—for example, a succession of diminished chords of the seventh, or languishing suspensions—forced them into some leg-moving rhythm, or other, and then stuck the whole in a "classical" form, "dug up" for the occasion, or not, as the case may be; of the latter, the "gavotte" is becoming tolerably "modern." The songs, as they are termed, are turned out with great rapidity, and the music to the drama, XYZ, is finished. It is applauded, and, after several performances, or, in the most favourable cases, after a voyage round the world, is laid up, ad acta, with its forefathers and brothers already assembled. That, however, the object of the music to a drama should be not merely to fill up pauses, but, as an integral and component part of the work, to impart animation to certain portions of it, and heighten the feeling exhibited in them, is a fact that only a very few seem to know or even to suspect, though the finest and most sublime specimen of this class of music—Beethoven's Egmont music—sometimes appears rather too familiar.

Music to Romeo and Juliet was written by Georg Abraham Schneider (1770—1839), and first performed at Berlin on the 14th January, 1821; by Wilhelm Freudenberg, in Wiesbaden; Lefevre-Niedermeyer—director of a school for church music in Paris—who gave a private performance of his work in 1866; and by G. Mertel, in Erfurt, who had a duet, "It was the Nightingale and not the Lark," out of what he had composed, publicly sung in that town on the 11th January of the present year. I know nothing further of his production, which, also, may possibly be an opera.

Separate airs for interpolation into Zingarelli's opera were written by Josef Wiegl, and into Bellini's Crescentini ("Einzig Geliebte" and "Ich bin bereit"). There exists, too, a scena and aria ("Ecco la Tomba") by Fr. Curschmann, Op. 6, to Romeo and Juliet.

Macbeth is, perhaps, more abundantly supplied with music than any other of Shakspere's works. Some was composed by Matthew Locke, 1672. Acccording to Schilling, Locke's music was an opera, and its full title: *Macbeth and the Tempest. Carl David Stegmann (1779) likewise wrote music to this play, as did Fr. Andr. Holly; Johann André (1741—1799); Aug. Friedrich Burgmüller (1777); Fr. L. Seidel; J. Fr. Reichardt; C. E. F. Weyse; Louis Spohr; Julius Rietz; and H. Sitt.

Music to Hamlet was written by J. D. Holland; Fr. Andr. Holly; Herm. Hirschbach; Pierson (a Funeral March); and Vict. Joucières.

For Lear J. Weigl wrote interludes, and Joh. André (1741—1799) other music.

The Tempest was provided with music by Thomas Arne (1710—1778), and Wilhelm Taubert. The latter wrote to an adaptation of the play by Fr. von Digelstädt, and his music was performed for the first time in 1856 at Munich. There is some Tempest music by Arthur Sullivan also.

Mühldorffer and Arthur Sullivan have written music to The Merchant of Venice; Galliard (Gaillard), C. W. Henning, Ignatz Ritter von Seyfried, and Hans von Bülow to Julius Cæsar Julius Rietz and Robert von Hornstein to As You Like It; Johan André (1741—1799), and Julius Tausch (Op. 4) to Twelfth Night; Friedrich von Flotow to The Winter's Tale; Fr. Ludw. Seidel to Coriolanus; Georg Abraham Schneider to King John; and Georg Abraham Schneider and Robert Volkmann to Richard III.

A goodly contingent of overtures has been furnished by various composers. Overtures to Romeo and Juliet have been written by Julius Hopfe, Louis Schlottmann (1864), Woldemar Bargiel, G. A. Macfarren, and Peter Tschaikowsky (1871); to Hamlet, by the Abbé Vogler, Alex. Malibran, Niels Gade (1861), Julius Hopfe, Alex. Stadtfeld, Jos. Joachim, Kaspar Jac. Bischoff, E. Bach, and G. A. Macfarren; to Macbeth, by Traug. Max. Eberwein, Heinefetter, Pearsall, and G. B. Bierey; to King Lear, by Hector Berlioz, Dumont, Flodoard, Geyer, Benedetto Maglione, Antonio Bazzini, Josef von Blumenthal, Mily von Balangrus, Balakireff and H. Schulz-Beuthen: to The Tempest, by Julius Benedict, Hagar, Georg Vierling, and Sterndale Bennett; to Othello, by Carl Rheinthaler (1849), F. L. Ritter, A. W. Ambros, Wilhelm Taubert (1833), Wilhelm Claussen, and Carl Machts; to The Merry Wives of Windsor, by Sterndale Bennett and Julius Hopfe; to Julius Cæsar, by Robert Schumann and Hermann Hirschbach. Furthermore there is an overture by Dr. Julius Alsleben to Twelfth Night; by Josef Rheinberger to The Taming of the Shrew (for pianoforte, four hands); by Louis Ehlert to the Winter's Tale; and by Robert Radecke to King John.

Many persons—among others, Emil Naumann—believe Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture to be written to Shakespere's Coriolanus. Such is not the case. It is written to the drama of the same name by Heinrich von Collin (1772—1811).

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

* This is probably what Herr Musiol means by: Macbeth and the tempst.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1873.

SO many concerts day by day ask for notice, and more or less deserve it, that some must needs be overlooked. It often happens, too, that the irony of Fate decrees the worst treatment to those which, on their merits, should have the best. The noisy and intrusive gain, while the modest and retiring lose. So it is all the world over, and with reference to all human affairs. None the less, however, should we strive to redress the wrong, and now take prominent notice of some recent musical doings which passed unobserved and unrecorded in the rush of events.

As far back as April 1, Herr Carl Deichmann gave an evening concert of much importance and attraction in the Hanover Square Rooms, assisted by the Crystal Palace orchestra and its conductor, Mr. Manns. Seldom has a programme of greater interest been presented to an audience of classical tastes. It included J. S. Bach's Suite, in D major, the one distinguished from its companion in the same key by the violin solo that plays so conspicuous a part. A chance of hearing the old master's orchestral works seldom comes, and Herr Deichmann could have presented nothing more welcome in these days of revived interest concerning all that Bach wrote. The performance, it is scarcely necessary to add, was complete and efficient—Herr Deichmann himself playing the solo. Another feature of interest was Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for violin and orchestra—as a most attractive but strangely neglected work. When will our solo violinists recognize the fact that there are concertos worth playing besides those of Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn? True, there may be few or none so adapted for effect; but a real artist should not always shape his course towards the goal of his own aggrandisement. Something is due to art, and this fact Herr Deichmann recognized by bringing forward Mozart's composition. He played it in the style natural to a first-class executant and a refined musician. The musicianship of the concert-giver was clearly shown by his MS. overture, Solitude—a work that deserves, and, indeed, requires to be heard again, in order that its full merit may appear. This remark applies, also, to a Concert-Stück in F major, for violin and orchestra, wherein the clever composer shows a rare knowledge of the art of producing effects by legitimate means. If for these novelties alone, the concert deserved special mention, because it revealed a painstaking and conscientious composer in one of our very best resident violinists. Other things were done, but we must content ourselves with the mention of those more important.

Two concerts were given on April 29, by as many pianists of mark. Place à la dame, who was Miss Agnes Zimmermann, an artist never to be mentioned without the respect due to great ability, and equal devotion to the highest interests of music. Miss Zimmermann collected her friends in the Hanover Square Rooms for the purpose of introducing to them a choice group of chamber compositions, among which were prominent Mendelssohn's Variations for piano and 'cello (Herr Daubert); an arrangement for piano, by the concert-giver, of Handel's little known, but most effective overture to Ariodante; and a Suite for piano, violin, and 'cello, which very ably set forth Miss Zimmermann's ability as a composer. The last-named work consists of an Introduction, a Canon on the seventh, a Gavotte, Air, and the usual Gigue as a finale. With reference to all these movements, it may be said that they proved the thorough study Miss Zimmermann has made of the style of Bach and Handel's day, and the rare faculty she possesses of throwing new matter into old forms. Another interesting feature at this concert was Brahms' Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), and yet another, Schubert's Rondo for violin and piano. All the pianoforte music was played, as a matter of course, by Miss Zimmermann. What kind of rendering it received there can be no need to tell, looking at the recognition long since accorded to the artist's skill.

The second concert on the 29th ult. was given by M. Alexandre Billet, the justly-famous French pianist, who, with it, began a series of very attractive recitals upon the instrument of which he is so great a master. M. Billet was assisted by his countrymen, MM. Sainton and Paque, and together, these capital artists played Schumann's pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 80); a work that never fails to interest even when it fails to charm. The Kreutzer Sonata has not often been heard to greater advantage than as performed by the concert-giver and M. Sainton. Both were thoroughly equal to the task, and each was worthy of the other. Dussek's fine Sonata in C minor—not heard since it was first brought forward by Mdme. Arabella Goddard at the Monday Popular Concerts—charmed every lover of the good old legitimate pianoforte school. Surely such music cannot permanently remain neglected by the mass of professors and amateurs. There must come a time when it will enjoy renewed popularity at any rate, it cannot die for good—no, bad and all. M. Billet concluded his programme with some small pieces by Mendelssohn, Field, and Brahms, whch, played to perfection, gave proportionate enjoyment.

We make no apology for the foregoing late notices of things now some time passed. Such concerts are an honour to art—the salt which preserves the freshness and purity of our musical pabulum.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW gave the first of his two promised "Pianoforte Recitals" on Monday afternoon, when the following was the programme:—

"Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3, in E flat, (L. v. Beethoven); Prélude et Fugue, pour l'Orgue, en si mineur. transcription pour piano de Liszt (J. S. Bach); Sonata, Op, 110, in A flat (L. v. Beethoven); "Un Carnaval à Vienne, 5 Morceaux de Fantaisie, Op. 26—Allegro, Romance, Scherzino, Inter-mezzo, Finale (R. Schumann); a. Notturno, Op. 37, No. 2, in G; b. Impromptu, Op. 36, in F sharp; c. Tarantella, Op. 43; d. Valse, Op. 42 (F. Chopin); "Venezia e Napoli, Canzone e Saltarello (F. Liszt)."

St. James's Hall was crowded, and the performances of Dr. von Bülow were applauded with enthusiasm.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

IT is strange to English ears to hear that bagpipes are employed in Scotland to attract customers to public-houses, as one note from that instrument would be thought sufficient to drive the most confirmed drunkard from the premises. Yet such is the case, and on Friday, at the Sheriff's Small Debt Court, Edinburgh, Thomas M'Guire, mason, sued John Stuart, publican, for the following account:—"To keeping in order bagpipes, and furnishing reeds for the same for two years, from 8th March, 1871, at 1*s. per week*, £5 4*s.*; new bag for bagpipes, 8*s.*, £5 12*s.*" The pursurer stated that defender kept a public-house, and made use of bagpipes to draw custom. Being constantly in requisition, the bagpipes required frequent repair, and Stuart engaged M'Guire to keep them in order. On the 8th ult., when M'Guire called on Stuart to reckon up the amount due for his services—namely, £5 12—a contra account was presented for whisky, reducing the claim to 18s. 6d. M'Guire contended that defender had no claim for the value of whisky supplied under the provisions of the Tippling Act. He admitted, nevertheless, that he had acknowledged his liability. The sheriff granted absolvitur. Possibly the music of bagpipes might be useful in England to arouse the drunken from their slumbers; for Congreve, after observing that "Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," adds—

> "I've read that things inanimate have moved,
> And as with living souls have been informed
> By magic numbers and persuasive sound."

A Scotch melody played on bagpipes would doubtless exercise as much or more effect on the lethargic sot as the stern command of the policeman, "Move out of this," even when aided by a kick in the ribs from a regulation boot. As a test to distinguish between the dying and the drunken, bagpipes would also be invaluable at a police-station.

WELSH SONGS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Referring to a notice in the Sunday Times of three Welsh songs, I venture to explain that no original words to the melodies of the songs in question are known to exist. I cannot, therefore, plead guilty to the charge of "divorce" brought against me, although, were I obliged to do so, I might with some reason cite Thomas Moore, Mrs. Hemans, and other illustrious examples in justification. This explanation is all the more necessary, inasmuch as Brinley Richards' edition of the "Songs of Wales" contains several instances similar to the three above-mentioned. I have written English words to many of the songs to which no original Welsh words are extant. The melodies have been taken, by permission, from Miss Williams's collection, and are published by Mr. Brinley Richards for the first time in a complete form.—I remain, Sir, yours obediently,

WALTER MAYNARD.

New Club, Liverpool.

UPON the recommendation of Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, Sir Julius Benedict, Sir George J. Elvey, and Sir John Goss, the degree of Doctor in Music has been conferred upon Mr. C. G. Verrinder, Mus. Bac., Oxon., by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

MR. CHARLES HALLE has resumed his very interesting and instructive "Pianoforte Recitals" at St. James's Hall. About these we have much to say: The "Recitals were never more attractive than they are now, if only because they were never more full of novelty.

THE "CHARACTER DIVER" EXPLAINED IN A PARAGRAPH.

In giving an account of the manners and customs of one of the planets, the author of "Another World" advances some peculiar theories on the subject of education. In that world it seems that "it is thought better to diminish moral evil by extirpating faults in the child rather than by punishing crimes in the man." A notable example is given in the appointment of certain officers called "character-divers," men of great discrimination, their duties, distinct from those of the preceptors, being to "dive" into the characters of children, to discover early faults, and eradicate the seed germ before it has had time to develope its virus, and develope serious faults, and perhaps crime.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The third concert for the second season of the Belgrave Minstrels was held on the 24th ult., by invitation of Mrs. Charles Fane, at her residence, 7, Norfolk Crescent, Hyde Park. A large circle attended to hear these amateur performers, who were most ably conducted by M. Francesco Berger, Mr. Morant giving valuable aid on his harmonium, as also solos on the concertina and zither. Mr. E. A. Tietkens' solo, "In native worth," accompanied by pianoforte and harmonium, was beautifully sung. A duet, from one of Handel's Italian operas, was very well and effectively rendered by Miss Henrietta Palmer and Mr. Theoley. Mrs. Buckton's solo, "Nacqui all' affanno," from Rossini's Cenerentola, was greatly admired, as was the celebrated trio from Guillaume Tell, sung by three amateurs. Colonel Stracey gave "The Stirrup Cup" in excellent style. The music was greatly applauded.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave her annual concert on Tuesday evening, when she repeated her clever classical Suite for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, with its "canon on the 7th," and Gigue. The Gigue was encored. An arrangement of Handel's overture to Ariodante, as a pianoforte solo, proves Miss Zimmermann's aptitude and enterprise in the scholastic department of her art. Brahms' pianoforte quartet in G minor was a bonne bouche. The other executants included Herr Strauss, Herr Daubert, and Mdme. Norman-Néruda.

Signor Odoardo Barri gave a ballad concert in St. James's Hall on Wednesday week. Some songs were sung which pleased greatly, as, for example, the concert-giver's "Love's golden past," well rendered by Miss Helen D'Alton, and unanimously redemanded; Mrs. Philips's "Sleep, baby darling," in which Madame F. Lancia displayed her usual artistic talent, and was encored; and Sullivan's "Little maid of Arcadee," beautifully sung by Miss Wynne, who also obtained a "bis." Other pieces well received were Barri's "Mizpah," sung by Signor Federici (recalled); Campana's "Vivere e Godere," capitally given by Signor Caravoglia (recalled); and Barri's "At Last," sung by Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen (recalled). The solo instrumentalists were Cavaliere Tito Mattei and Signor Rendano, both of whom played pianoforte solos of their own, the first-named receiving a general encore. There were other selections, which we must dismiss with the general remark that they were well given. Some part-songs, by the Quartet Union, elicited much applause. The accompanists were Mr. A. Sullivan and Signor Barri.

Mr. E. Thorne's first concert took place in the Hanover Square Rooms on Wednesday week, and attracted a good audience. The programme commenced with Bach's Sonata in A major, for pianoforte and violin, well played by the concert-giver and Herr Ries. Mr. E. Thorne's first trio in G major for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello—a work which does the composer great credit—was entrusted to Messrs. Thorne, Ries, and Howell, and merited the applause with which it was greeted. Mendelssohn's duet in D for pianoforte and violoncello was also given, as well as Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, played by Mr. Thorne, and much appreciated. The solo vocalist was Miss Enriquez, who sang Rossini's aria, "O Salutaris," Madame Sainton Dolby's "He thinks I do not love him," and E. H. Thorne's "On a faded violet" (encored). The part-songs, "Lake and waterfall" (E. H. Thorne), "The three fishers" (Macfarren), and "Phœbus" (Barnby), were fairly rendered by a small choir of fifty voices. Mr. Thorne's second concert will take place on the 6th of June, when will be performed his new characteristic pieces for piano, and a new trio in C minor. Judging by what was heard on Wednesday, the future productions of this rising musician will deserve careful notice.

Mr. A. J. Barth's third concert took place in St. George's Hall on Saturday, the 26th ult. The bénéficiaire was assisted by the following artists:—Mdme. F. Lancia, Miss L. Braham, Miss Jessie Royd, and Mr. J. W. Turner (vocalists); Mr. A. Pollitzer (violin), and M. Paque (violoncello). The concert commenced with Mendelssohn's grand Trio in C minor (Op. 66), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, which was capitally played by Messrs. Barth, Pollitzer, and Paque. Beethoven's grand Sonata in C (Op. 53), for pianoforte, and Schumann's Schummerlied and Traumes-Wirren, for the same instrument, were admirably executed by Mr. Barth, who merited the applause which greeted his performances. Other instrumental pieces were Chopin's "Introduction and Polonaise," for pianoforte and violoncello, and a "Rondeau" of Schubert's for pianoforte and violin. Madame F. Lancia sang, in her usual excellent style, "Le jour de Fête" (Louisa Gray), and Madame Dolby's genial new song, "The G-l-o-v-e." Miss Jessie Royd was heard to advantage in Bishop's "Ye little birds," and Barth's "The sky was bright," not less successful being Miss L. Braham and Mr. J. W. Turner in other pieces.

The thirteenth concert by the pupils of Mr. Roylance's singing and concertina classes took place at the Store Street concert-room on Wednesday week, and gave general satisfaction. The programme comprised something like twenty-five items. The concertina performances were creditable to master and pupils, and in a selection of English airs Mr. Roylance gave evidence of the mastery he has over the instrument. The "concertina band," which numbered about a dozen executants, was worthy of the encomiums bestowed. Messrs. Worley, Lowe, Brockwell, and Stevens, deserve honourable mention. A pianoforte duet brought into notice Messrs. Ferdinand and Wolters. In the vocal part of the concert Miss Marion Williams carried off the "palm." Miss Bayne sang pleasantly, as did also Mr. Willis (Wilford Morgan's "My sweetheart when a boy"), Mr. Adams ("The British tar"), Miss Claremont, Mr. H. Gordon, &c.

The Horns Assembly Rooms was fully attended on Monday week, at the benefit of Miss Ellen Dix. The bénéficiaire was in excellent voice, and sang with much taste a recitative and air from La Sonnambula, and gained an encore for Mr. Gadsby's "Those little words, good bye." Miss Wild sang "The Lady of the Lea;" Madame Poole was encored in Pinsuti's "I love my love;" and Mr. H. Guy gave Sullivan's "Once again" so well that he had to repeat it. Mr. Wm. Gadsby's songs were received with special approbation, and the pianoforte solos of Mr. Henry Gadsby were an agreeable feature in the programme—one especially, "Pegasus," being encored. Some trios, a part-song, and a serenade were also included. Mr. Parker was the accompanist.

Mr. Trelawny Cobham's Matinée, held at the residence of the Marquis and Marchioness of Downshire, was attended by an audience as numerous as it was aristocratic. Mr. Cobham's programme was especially made to suit the taste of his patrons, and consisted chiefly of vocal compositions by Italian composers, interpreted by Mdme. Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Sinico, Misses Eleanor Armstrong, Hope, and Purdy; Signors Gardoni, Caravoglia, and Federici. Signor Tito Mattei and Herr Ganz were the pianists, and Mdlle. de Bono the violinist. Among the pieces that met with more than usual applause were Mozart's "Dalla sua pace," and a song by Signor Barri, entitled "Alone for ever," after both of which Mr. Cobham was recalled. Signor Gardoni's appearance was the signal for a "flutter" of admiration among the fair part of the audience, and the charming way in which he sang Signor Scuderi's "Dormi pur" elicited marked applause. Signor Caravoglia was equally complimented for his singing of Rossini's "La Luna." Mdme. Florence Lancia was especially good in Rode's "O dolce incanto;" Madame Sinico in Herr Ganz's "Miss Camelia" (recalled); and Miss Purdy in Mr. Cowen's popular song, "Marguerite" (recalled). Signor Tito Mattei attracted attention by his performance of two pieces of his own composition—"Souvenir d'Italie" (Nocturne), and "Impromptu" (Caprice), and was recalled. Mdlle. De Bono and Herr Ganz elicited deserved marks of approval in a duet for violin and piano. The concert altogether went off with spirit. The accompanists were Signor Pinsuti, Mr. H. Parker, and Herr Ganz.

Mdme. Puzzi's matinée invitation, on Monday last, at St. George's Hall, was attended by a large number of aristocratic patrons, who were provided with an excellent programme, including not only music, but a "comédie," La Soirée Perdué, text by Mdlle. Marie Dumas, with poetry by Alfred Musset, capitally acted by Mdlle. Dumas, and the, in his peculiar walk, inimitable M. Jules Lefort. The singers were Mdme. Florence-Lancia, Mdlle. Limia, Miss Enriquez, Mdme. Anna Regan-Schimon, Messieurs Trelawny Cobham, Arthur Stevens, Edwin Holland, Signori Caravoglia and Topai, who all exerted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience. Mdme. Florence Lancia gave two pianoforte mazurkas, by Chopin, arranged for the voice, with brilliant effect, and obtained a "recall," and Mr. Trelawny Cobham received the same honour for Mozart's "Dalla sua pace." The accompanists were Signori Pinsuti, Vera, M. Schimon, and Herr Ganz, whose popular canzone, "Miss Camelia," was capitally sung by Mdlle. Limia.

Herr and Madame Sauerbrey's concert took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Thursday evening, May 1st, when the rooms were completely filled by an audience who appreciated the programme put forth by the talented bénéficiaires. The concert commenced with a clever performance, by Herren Sauerbrey and Ludwig, of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 12, for pianoforte and violin. The same artists also played Dussek's Sonata in B flat, in artistic style, both being received with well-merited favour. Herr Sauerbrey played Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 22, receiving great applause for his excellent performance, as did Herr Ludwig for two solos on the violin (the adagio from Spohr's Seventh Concerto, and J. S. Bach's "præludium") in E, his tone and execution being all that could be desired. A pupil of Herr Sauerbrey, Miss Lizzie Glass, played Pauer's solo, "Le Cascade," and a fantaisie march, entitled, "Souvenir d'Ecosse," the composition of her master. She was applauded and recalled for her excellent performance. Madame Sauerbrey sang Pinsuti's "I love my love," Meyerbeer's "Fishermaiden," Mozart's "Violet," and Rossini's "Ah, quel giorno," in all of which she displayed her fine voice to advantage. Madame Sauerbrey also sang, with Mr. Alfred Hemming, the popular duet by Nicolai, "One word," to the evident gratification of all present. Miss Katherine Poyntz gave, with artistic feeling, Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," and was recalled; she also sang Costa's quartet, "Ecco qual fiero," in conjunction with Madame Sauerbrey, and Messrs. Hemming and Maybrick. Mr. Alfred Hemming appeared for the first time since his return from Italy and Spain. His voice is much improved both in power and tone. He gave an excellent interpretation of Verdi's recitative and aria, "Quando le sere," which was loudly and deservedly applauded and encored. He also sang one of Reichardt's lieder with equal effect. Mr. Maybrick sang two songs effectively; and Messrs. Pinsuti, Stanislaus, and Herr Sauerbrey accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

Welsh Choral Union.—This thriving Choral Union gave the second of their public concerts in the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Monday evening, under the direction of their clever conductor, Mr. John Thomas. The choir was decidedly improved by the addition of the students of the Royal Academy, and sang with much greater precision than last season. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's cantata, Athalie, which was gone through most creditably. The solo singers were Miss Jessie Jones (in place of Miss Sophie Ferrari, announced, but unable to sing in consequence of a severe cold,) Miss Lydia Elsmore, and Miss Purdy, who gave the several pieces allotted to them in a satisfactory manner, all being loudly applauded. The dialogue was read by Mr. A. Matthison, who declaimed it with effect and power. Mrs. Henry Davies and Mr. W. H. Thomas presided at the pianoforte, adding much to the success of the concert. A band of harps and the organ also accompanied the cantata. The favourite march was loudly re-demanded. The second portion of the concert was of a miscellaneous character, consisting of Welsh choruses and part-songs. Miss Purdy gave a song by Mr. Cowen with great effect. Mr. A. Matthison displayed his voice to advantage in a song by the late Mr. Weiss; and Mr. John Thomas, in two of his brilliant harp solos, was encored and recalled. Mr. Alphonse Duvernoy (a French pianist), after some pieces by Chopin, and a Rapsodie by Liszt, also received the compliment of a recall. The concert gave much satisfaction to all present.

PROVINCIAL.

Liverpool.—The subjoined is an extract from the Liverpool Albion:—

"The first rehearsal of the Liverpool Representative Choir took place on Saturday evening at the Free Library, under the direction of Mr. Sanders. In addition to this body of vocalists, two of our local church choirs are in active preparation to compete at the National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace in July next. It is satisfactory to know that the exertions of those who have supported Mr. Willert Beale's large undertaking in this district have been so far successful. The practice on Saturday evening proved beyond all doubt that the Representative Choir will be a very fine choir, and when trained, as Mr. Sanders can train singers, will have every chance of distinction at Sydenham. The title of the choir naturally gives every individual member a personal interest in the movement, and is, for that reason, if for none other, a good one."

Exeter.—On Friday evening, (May 2nd) Mr. and Mrs. Rousby took a joint benefit, and were rewarded by a house crowded to suffocation. Mr. and Mrs. Rousby have done much towards reviving a wholesome dramatic taste, by producing in a perfect manner pieces untainted by the morbid horrors for which there prevails at present such a general and unnatural "penchant," and equally free from the bombastic flimsiness which borders so closely upon burlesque. 'Twixt Axe and Crown is a play possessing a good sensible plot, and close brilliant dialogue, facts of which most London amusement seekers are aware; but possibly its first success may be in a great measure attributable to the perfect impersonations of Mr. and Mrs. Rousby as Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and the Lady Elizabeth. Mr. Rousby, as the wily prelate, is simply astonishing, the cunning expression, and leisurely speech and action reminding us of nothing so much as a doxing serpent. Mrs. Rousby is gifted with a personal appearance peculiarly suited to the rôle of the virgin queen, while her highly finished style of acting and elocution are displayed advantageously in the numerous situations and lengthy dialogue with which it is invested. Miss Douglas makes the most of the opportunity afforded her as Queen Mary; but looks too young, and is unquestionably too pretty, if historical description is to have any weight in the matter. Miss Bella Cuthbert plays with taste and sprightliness as Isabella Markham, and Mr. Archibald Lindsay as Edward Courteney evinces, not only the possession of talent, but judgment and stage aptitude. "The Screen Scene" from "The School for Scandal" with a variety of farces, have supplemented, and succeeded Mr. Taylor's play. On Tuesday Mr. and Mrs. Rousby paid us a return visit, when The Merchant of Venice and As you like it were the pieces selected, a desire having been expressed to see Mrs. Rousby in comedy.—W. S. J.

Stroud.—We take the following from a local journal:—

"The concert of Old English music which had been arranged for the purpose of starting a fund for a new organ for the Stroud parish church, by Mr. E. W. Christie, of Bisley, took place on Tuesday evening week at the Subscription Rooms, and was a most signal success. The programme was thoroughly in character with the promise held forth, and, whilst it was genuinely classical, had not the slightest shade of heaviness. An audience comprising most of the leading amateurs of the borough was kept in rapt admiration from eight o'clock till eleven at the varied character of the treat provided. In these "brisk and giddy-paced times," when music-hall ditties are served up in the drawing-room, and when young ladies' performances are nothing if not 'brilliant,' it calls forth a freshness of feeling to be carried back to the quiet beauty our forefathers admired. The arrangement of the book of the words which was circulated in the room was a work of great care and taste, and agreeably enhanced the enjoyment of the programme. Besides giving us the source from which the piece was taken, there were short literary reminiscences connected with the biographies of the most gifted, and the programme comprised the names of as many of the Old English composers as it was possible to squeeze into it. And if the programme itself was good, Mr. Christie was equally happy in the artists he engaged to assist at its interpretation. First came the names of Master Aynsley Cooke, principal treble at Her Majesty's Chapel, Windsor, and Master Aldridge, principal treble at New College, Oxford. Then came Mr. Bickley, of the Birmingham Glee Union; Mr. Kearton, tenor of Wells Cathedral; Mr. Hunt, the well-known tenor of St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Mr. Hallewell, a splendid bass of New College, Oxford, and our old favourite, Mr. Brandon, of Gloucester. When to these we add that Miss Clark was the pianist, and was assisted by a gentleman amateur of great talent, Mr. Steuart Powell, we are warranted in according Mr. Christie the warmest thanks of the music-loving public for bringing such an array of talent together."

Malvern.—We take the following from the pages of our esteemed contemporary, the Malvern News:—

"The Malvern Link Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. Philip Klitz—whose numerous musical compositions are well-known to many in this neighbourhood—as now constituted, comprises a fair number of amateurs, possessing considerable abilities both in vocal and instrumental music. They have continued to meet at regular periods for a length of time, during which they have rehearsed The Pic-nic, and pieces from Mozart's works. The Pic-nic is a cantata by J. R. Thomas, an American writer of well-known celebrity, and the solos and choruses describe most vividly the journey to the locus in quo where the imaginary pic-nic is to be held: the arrival, the beauty of the landscape and scenery, the music of nature, the waltzing and skipping of the merry-makers, the storm, sunshine after rain and the return home. All these incidents are touched upon, the music being most appropriate and artistic. The description of the rising hurricane, the thunder and lightning, and the bright and beautiful weather that follows is a masterpiece of musical descriptive writing; and the whole cantata being so simple, yet effective, cannot but find favour wherever it is heard. On Tuesday week the Malvern Link Choral Union will give their third concert, when the cantata will be performed in its entirety, for the first time publicly in Malvern. The concert will be held in the Link Lecture-hall. Mr. Klitz will be the conductor."

Plymouth.—The Western Daily Press thus refers to a recent performance of Israel in Egypt in Plymouth:—

"The third and concluding concert of the season of the Plymouth Amateur Vocal Association was in some respects, but not in all, a greater success than any previous performance of the society. The work is a peculiar one, and has special difficulties. The solos and duets are few and irregularly introduced, the choruses are difficult and numerous, and nearly all of them are double, requiring two choirs, which have to be trained both severally and jointly. The amount of time and labour thus involved is beyond measure greater than the preparation required for an ordinary oratorio. It is with more than common satisfaction, therefore, that we are able to congratulate Mr. Lohr on the almost absolute perfection which in this department has been attained. With a vigour which seemed to know no flagging, a precision which knew no faltering, a power that, at times, almost shook the hall, and a tuneful taste indicating an intelligent choir and efficient guidance, twenty choruses were sung to the intense delight of the largest audience that has ever listened to an oratorio in Plymouth. The association has had heretofore to lament its financial condition; if last night's concert does not go far to place the balance on the right side, there are mysteries about musical finance that we cannot fathom. Once for all, we may here say, the band was deserving of high praise. Mr. Reed ed with his accustomed skill, and was very ably seconded, not only by he amateurs who have for many concerts played so steadily and so well, but also by the band of the Royal Marines, whose musical ardour was evidently quite equal to their well-known ability. Incidentally we have referred to the grandeur of the choruses and the admirable way in which they were sung. Those given in the first part especially elicited positively enthusiastic applause, and two had to be repeated in obedience to not-to-be-denied encores. These were the celebrated 'Hailstone' chorus, and 'I will sing unto the Lord.' An old hand at oratorio music said last night that even in Exeter Hall the choruses were never better done."

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From the "Court Circular," January 18, 1873).

This book is both clever and imaginative. Hermes is a very ingenious writer, who transports us to a realm which is at once new and wonderful, and which he describes with infinite skill. Some parts of the book are so weird and fantastic that it is difficult to peruse them calmly. In support of our assertion we would instance the following passage:—

"I have spoken above of our sympathetic attracting-machine, and I may mention here that by means of certain acids acted on by the sun's rays, a person can be compelled to move even from a great distance towards a given point in the way willed by the operator. It is, however, necessary to discover, first, the particular acids that have most affinity with the person to be attracted. To ascertain these with certainty, there is a little instrument with many separate cells, all communicating by means of its tube with one little ball, and each containing a different acid. Unless some attraction, or power in sympathy with the acids, is applied to the ball, the acids remain quiescent, each in its separate compartment. To discover what acids have most attractive force with a given person, the ball is placed against his breast, whereupon the portions of those acids which have affinity with him rush forth from their respective cells up each tube into the ball, where they immediately commingle, forming one compound liquid of unequal component parts. The scientific man charged with the operation then notes the exact quantities of each of the component acids, and all pertinent particulars. This is an easy process. Each principal acid is weighed before being placed in its cell, which is open from the top; and before the ball is removed from the chest, what remains of each acid is taken out from its compartment and re-weighed. The difference between the weights, before and after the operation, gives the exact weight of each acid, forming one of the component parts of the amalgamated fluid in the ball. The particular sympathetic acids and their proportions having been ascertained, the attracting machine is prepared and charged with a large quantity of the sympathetic compound, sufficiently powerful to attract the person selected, although placed at some distance. To be effective, however, the operation must take place while the sun is shining; and it is also necessary that the person directing the machine should exercise a certain amount of will tending towards the end desired. The power of will is great, and there are a few persons who can make others do certain things without the aid of the instrument, by the power of will alone; but, in such cases, the person 'willing' must be near the person acted on."

To all lovers of curious books we recommend this strange vision of a world in a star; and Hermes is certainly to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention.

"SONGS OF WALES."†

(From the "Liverpool Porcupine.")

Mr. Brinley Richards' devotion to the popularising of the music of his country is crowned by the production of his excellent book "The Songs of Wales." Here may be found, wedded to English words, the stirring national airs of the Cymru, already so familiar as "fantasias," "marches," and "arrangements" of all kinds for the pianoforte. Mr. Richards' sound scholarship is a guarantee for the editing, whilst his knowledge of, and enthusiasm for, Welsh music insures the "best" that can be made of the subject. The result is a book that may do for Wales what Sir John Stevenson's arrangement of Irish airs has done for the sister island. Mr. Richards has not had a Moore to co-operate with him, the land of bards not having yet produced a poet. The words of most of the songs, however, are good, being selected from Sir Walter Scott, Mrs. Hemans, &c. Others, added by John Oxenford and Walter Maynard, are above the average merit of the modern ballad. We are proud to make the acquaintance of the last-named gentleman re-christened "Pencerdd Caerludd."

DALY AND FECHTER.

(From the New York "Dramatic World.")

The public are at last given to understand that the unaccountable delay in the inauguration of the Lyceum Theatre has been due to misunderstandings between Mr. Fechter and Mr. William Butler Duncan, which have resulted in the enforced retirement of the former from the enterprise. The nature of these difficulties is not definitely known, but will be explained, if it is true, as reported, that Mr. Fechter intends to bring a suit for damages against Mr. Duncan. Meanwhile, we are not to be cheated out of Monte Christo, as will be seen by the following correspondence:—

"My Dear Mr. Fechter,—I am told that the difficulties which have prevented the opening of your 'Lyceum' all winter have finally culminated, and that you have withdrawn altogether from the concern. Believe me no one can regret this more than I do, for I have a firm faith in the multiplicity of good theatres, and believe that every additional first-class entertainment which is added to the list of metropolitan amusements immediately increases the special public to which it appeals, and becomes directly beneficial to all. It is for this reason that I sincerely regret I am not to have the opportunity of welcoming you as a brother manager. However, something is in my power, and I hasten to propose it to you. The public have been looking forward with eagerness for nearly twenty months to your re-appearance on the New York stage, and to your splendid production of Monte Christo; and I am certain that the present dramatic season would be considered wholly incomplete if you should be forced to disappoint them in both. I therefore offer you the stage of the Grand Operahouse for the balance of the season. I am aware that the period I have to offer does not furnish you with the opportunity for the extended run for your magnificent play which you have every reason to expect; but I beg you will consider it in the spirit I have suggested it, and let me have your decision as early as possible.—Very sincerely yours,

"New York, March 28, 1873." "Augustin Daly.

"Dear Mr. Daly,—I really don't know how to answer your kind proposal, or, rather, I answer, by accepting it at once. You have taken a frightful load off my mind—that of breaking faith with the public. Although I was unlawfully and in a vile way forced to it, I could not bear the notion of disappointing my supporters. Thanks to you, I feel myself anew, and, thanks to you again, Monte Christo will be presented this season in spite of all ugly tricks to prevent its performance. Name your terms, I accept them d'avance, and shall ever consider myself in your debt for the light your brotherly assistance will throw on the whole matter.—Yours thankfully, "Charles Fechter.

"No. 34, Tenth Street, March 28, 1873."

Mr. Fechter will appear at the Grand Operahouse, Monday evening, April 28th, in Monte Christo.

Hints for our School Boards.

(From "Another World.")

In my visits to the schools I had been struck with the fact that little account was taken of the characters of children—their qualifications and natural tendencies, physical or mental; the attempt was to force the boy to the system, not to adapt the system to the boy. One routine existed for all pupils, whether for the inculcation of the love of study or for the correction of faults. The earnest and passionate nature was treated in the same way as the cold and phlegmatic; the boy of genius or talent, as the dullard; the one who loved, as he who disliked, or had a tendency to dislike, study; the weakly, as the strong. They were all driven together like a flock of sheep, with scarcely any regard to individual capabilities, bent of genius, or physical constitution, which, indeed, little effort, and that ill-directed, had been made to discover. I had observed, also, boys with the germs of great genius, who, for want of some minor quality, were rejected, and, perhaps, placed in some lower division, humiliated and discouraged, although with care the deficient quality might have been supplied. The want of this perhaps would make the boy a recruit to the ranks of evil, or at least unfit him, when a man, for the real business of life. It was the small bolt wanting to enable the machine to do its work properly. Hermes.

MDLLE. AIMÉE DESCLÉE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—In the interests of literature as well as art, it should be known that the engagement of Mdlle. Aimée Desclée, of the Gymnase Theatre, in Paris, has suggested to those in authority a more rigid censure than has ever been known in this country. We learn with astonishment that no less than twenty-one plays, written for the most part by authors of the highest eminence in France, members of the French Academy, and dramatic authors of European celebrity, have been absolutely forbidden in London. Against this decision, sir, there is apparently no appeal, except to the public through the columns of a newspaper. When the engagement of Mdlle. Aimée Desclée is at an end, it will be too late to question the propriety of the autocratic assertion that the literary work of such men as Emile Augier and Octave Feuillet, of the Academy of France, of Theodore Barrière, Pailleron, and Emile de Girardin is unfit for the polite ears of the audiences of London. There may possibly be two opinions concerning the curious crusade of Alexandre Dumas and his peculiar views on morality, though to sanction the acting of Les Idées de Mdme. Aubrey, and to forbid La Princesse Georges, appears to me the height of inconsistency. I will take the narrowest possible view of this matter, and acquiesce, if you please, in the ostracism of Dumas from England, and the expulsion of Meilhac and Halévy; though, to tell the truth, I was permitted by the particular censor to grin last year at a very well acted but very nasty play, called Madame attend Monsieur, and to roar this year over the suggestive passages in Tricoche et Cacolet. Let us beg the question of Alexandre Dumas and the authors of the questionable comic opera, though there is literally nothing between them in common. Let me take my stand by men like Augier, Sardou, Octave Feuillet, and Emile de Girardin, who are really unjustly thrust out and refused a hearing. One fact is said to be worth a thousand arguments, and I merely ask your leave to quote a short passage from the article of an able critic in Macmillan's Magazine, who, some years since, alluded pointedly to the tone and meaning of Emile de Girardin's Supplice d'une Femme, proposed to be played by Mdlle. A. Desclée in London next month, but refused resolutely by the examiner of stage plays, or his superior officer, the Lord Chamberlain:—

"Another case in point," says the writer, "is to be found in the Supplice d'une Femme. M. de Girardin, to whose various manifestations of himself the public is indispensable, who could not breathe if he did not feel the public was there—M. de Girardin, who could address the nation from every tribune and through every organ, did not hesitate to turn at once towards the stage. A great disorder seemed in his sight to be existing socially. He laid it bare. For years writers of all degrees had been excusing adultery, poetising illicit love. He was struck only by its terrors and its vileness. He painted coarsely a picture of what adultery really is, tore away its poetry, showed the degradation achieved by a woman who is loved illicitly and sentenced to the perpetuity of her fault. The effect was attained. The piece was inferior in every point of view save one. It was ill-written, ill-constructed; but it contained a truth, and for that it stood and still stands. It also told upon the public mind and life as much as any political harangue, or any Churchman's sermon."

Yet, for all this, Le Supplice d'une Femme is pronounced immoral by the literary guardians of public morality, and De Girardin's sermon is carelessly flung aside with the noble works of Emile Augier, Feuillet, Barrière, and Victorien Sardou. This is not a question of morality or immorality. It is the important question of an implied insult to French literature, owing to an unfortunate, but not irrevocable, mistake.—

Yours obediently,
An Englishman.

WHAT HANDEL BORROWED.

By Ferdinand Hiller.*

Victor Schœlcher, an amiable but very radical Frenchman, a member of the Versailles Assembly, deemed it expedient, at the beginning of the Napoleonic sway, to leave his native country, and make sure of an unimpeachable place of abode on the other side the Channel. In London, he must have been overwhelmingly impressed with the grand figure of Handel. Handel is, indeed, the only poet (in the widest acceptation of the word) who sheds a most brilliant and never-interrupted light over the monster metropolis, almost in the same way as Michael Angelo in Rome. A man may live a long time in London without being even so much as reminded of Shakespere, whom, in the wretched state of dramatic art in England, people seldom think of glorifying where more than anywhere else he ought to be glorified, upon the stage. Handel's works, on the contrary, continually constitute the best and most important parts of all musical performances; and we know on what a colossal scale his oratorios are presented at the Handel Festivals to audiences that would suffice to people several towns. Schœlcher, who is enthusiastically fond of music, must, as already remarked, have been deeply impressed by this; for, as far back as 1857, he published a thick octavo volume, The Life of Handel, a work of conscientious research and loving labour. Strange to say, it was only a year later that the first volume appeared of Chrysander's Handel—a book, it is true, of far higher pretensions, but still awaiting completion.

With reference to the "Dettingen Te Deum," Schœlcher speaks with indignation of the utterances of English musicians and musical scholars, who blame Handel for appropriating detached motives, fragments, and even whole pieces from other composers. Novello, he informs us, says: "Handel picked up pebbles and changed them into diamonds," and Sir G. Smart: "he took diamonds and polished them." "A large number of movements in the 'Dettingen Te Deum' are said to be taken from a similar work by Urio; and, if we are to believe all Dr. Crotch asserts, Handel is a musical Cartouche. And yet," says Schœlcher, "Handel was so far from tricking himself out in borrowed plumes, that in the MS. of The Messiah he appended a note to the Pastoral, saying the melody was one played by the Roman Pifferari—and can it be supposed that this simple, and honest man, so rich himself, could have wished to filch their property from others? Impossible. All these so-called thefts are incidental, transient and involuntary resemblances."*

Chrysander speaks very differently, and we must cite his own words. He is referring to a "Magnificat" by Erba, which Handel has used in Israel in Egypt. "In this re-melting process," says Chrysander, "there occur things, speaking in a purely intellectual as well as a musical sense, which are thoroughly new, and so overpowering that an observer has difficulty in preserving the necessary equilibrium during his investigation. What Handel retained note for note, and what he fashioned completely afresh, in the most unexpected manner, has become his own, every bit of it. How great Handel is, and what a position he occupies relatively to, and overtowering, other composers, is shown by nothing more plainly than by such examples. If the instance before us be satisfactorily examined, the question of robbery can by no means arise; and no less certain is it that it was not arrogance which induced Handel thus to remodel the works of others. It was the impulse of his artistic nature not to let perish tone-thoughts, which he saw only half-shaped, and, as is generally the case under the circumstances, in a sphere that was foreign to them. What is incomprehensible in the matter is the fact of his instantly perceiving the place to which they belonged, as well as of their forthwith appearing before him in a more perfect shape and as the heralds of great events. His mind here works like some natural force, leaving far behind all calculation and reflection." Further on he observes: "And when Handel built oratorios out of sacred, instrumental, and chamber pieces, in what way did he act differently from Shakespere, who fashioned his dramas from tales, plays, chronicles, and songs?"

Chrysander now sends us to a following volume, where he says he shall discuss the remodelling of Erba's "Magnificat" for the oratorio of Israel in Egypt. But our curiosity to learn more is disappointed. In discussing this oratorio Chrysander remarks: "As, meanwhile, many other details have turned up, there would be abundant materials for a very exhaustive account. A really satisfactory consideration of the subject, however—and an unsatisfactory consideration of it could profit no one—combined with what refers to the other works, would fill a book, and, therefore, had better be reserved for one."

After we have thus again been put off to a subsequent work, and put off, moreover, at the very place most unconditionally fitted for an account of the sources of Israel in Egypt, it would almost seem as though Herr Chrysander, despite his views, did not much fancy going more deeply into the subject. But this is not the case, for, as the fifth volume of the Denkmäler der Tonkunst, published by him, we have the "Te Deum" of F. A. Urio "as the source of Handel's Saul, Allegro, 'Dettingen Te Deum,'" &c.—that is to say, a palpable document for discovering Handel's borrowings, which are so abused and so bepraised.

This work of a composer but little known makes us acquainted with something of no ordinary significance. His motives possess the pithily diatonic and healthily rhythmical nature of that period. Their treatment in five-part choruses, in solo, two-part, and three-part pieces, shows the practised counterpuntist, with a leaning to polyphony, though sometimes his powers do not keep pace with his aims, which here and there give rise to instances of harmonic incorrectness (apart from the faults evidently to be laid to the charge of the engraver and the reader). That the composition might at first sight be ascribed to Handel is very natural, for a great deal it contains is to be met with again in his work, and it plainly served as a kind of sketch when the "Dettingen Te Deum" was being written. What did not appear suited for use there, found a place in Handel's other works, but, it is true, in a wonderfully genial manner, worthy of this extraordinary master.

Music cannot be described, and for a man to be able to enter clearly into detail about it, he ought to call in the assistance, if not of the piano, at least of music-paper. A few hints must, therefore now suffice. In the first place, the distribution of the text for the separate musical pieces is, in its leading features, the same in both "Te Deums," though it must be mentioned that Urio used the Latin words, and Handel the English translation. In some cases, Handel combines a larger number of verses into one of those broadly-proportioned specimens of composition known to every serious lover of music, while the Italian forms several smaller pieces out of them. It is an especially striking fact that in the employment of the chorus as well as of single solo parts, or of several such together, Handel nearly always follows the plan adopted by Urio. But it is a most varied task, of the highest interest to a musician, to trace in what way Handel proceeds with the motives he makes his own. At one time, he beautifies them by little alterations, and at another he treats them with greater breadth, or employs them differently in modulation. He uses them as contrasts to motives of his own, or enriches them with such motives. A short prelude, cast by Urio to the winds, becomes, in Handel's hands, the characteristic figure in the accompaniment of a long movement; a couple of lost bars are given as the leading idea of an important piece. By transposition to another key, by a more open introduction of the parts, and by being powerfully strengthened towards the conclusion, one fugue, used, it is true, a great deal, achieves an effect of which it would have been difficult to entertain a presentiment. Then, by the breath of a harmonic succession, by a couple of insignificant notes, by a small accidental rhythmical motive, Handel is excited to a deep and powerful creation of fancy, the embryo of which we should never seek here, did we not know how lasting was his connection with Urio's work. The composition of the "Dettingen Te Deum" belongs to the year 1743. But even the oratorio of Saul, written in 1738, bears traces of Handel's familiarity with the production of the Italian composer. It is, by the way, the very first eight bars, among others—bars completely disregarded by their composer—which Handel turned to account in the most original manner. He made of them the theme of a carillon (a small anachronism, perhaps), which accompanies the song of the Israelitish maidens, when they joyfully greet the young Shepherd with the winged words: "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands."

VIENNA.—A joint-stock company for the manufacture of pianos has just been started on a grand scale under the title of the "Wiener-Clavierfabriks-Gesellschaft," with a capital of two million florins. The Abatte Franz Liszt is the patron, Prince Rudolph Liechtenstein the president, or, as he would be denominated in England, the chairman, and Dr. Hanslick his vice, while Professor Dachs, Herren Herbeck and Hellmesberger are among the members of the committee. Herren Bösendorfer and Friedrich Ehrbar, the well-known pianoforte makers, whose respective businesses and plant have been purchased by the company, have undertaken to fill the posts of managing directors for ten years.

MR. BEECHER ON CHURCH MUSIC.

In his fifth lecture before the theological students of Yale College last week, Mr. Beecher gave to some extent his views upon Church Music. Set forth with the clearness which is one of his characteristics, the logic of his argument is equally well defined. He divides the service into two portions, the sermon "that instructs, that incites emotion through the reason," and the "music, following it up and inciting to emotion through the imagination." The one is the correlative of the other, while both tend similarly towards the awaking of devotion. Pursuing the idea, Mr. Beecher continues, "Music is itself not so much an agent in affecting the understanding as it is in affecting that part of man's nature which a sermon leaves comparatively barren. Now, it is true in the Roman service, and to a great extent in the Episcopal service, that it reaches the devout imagination; that it reaches toward, if not actually to inspire, veneration and awe; that it does feel for the chords whose response is worship."

Upon this he bases an argument that clergymen should possess sufficient cultivated musical taste to know when the organist is playing inappropriate airs, and be able to correct any of the freaks to which that class of performers is so liable. But the lecturer, although perceiving very distinctly wherein clergymen are at fault through ignorance, apparently fails to recognize the more common cause. The feminine element is so largely developed by the education which ministers receive and their subsequent associations, that jealousy is as much the reason for bad music in churches as lack of knowledge. If a minister is allowed to control the organist, he generally insists upon selecting such pieces that the congregation shall have no inducement to think of anything but him. In the hands of the average music committee, the organist fares little better; left to himself, he naturally plays what pleases him, and very often what Mr. Beecher styles "a fashionable waltz, with a long leg stretched out here and there to make it sound like Sunday music." How this clashing of rival personalities is to be done away with, Mr. Beecher does not inform us, save by saying that "the minister should be the bishop of the organ and the organist too." That this would remedy the difficulty may be doubted. We would rather suggest the plan that clergyman and organist cease to consider themselves as distinct entities, and by remembering in what service they are engaged, subordinate opposing desires for prominence to a consideration of how they may best work together harmoniously for the education of true devotion.—Arcadian.

On the occasion of the three hundredth representation of Mignon, M. Ambroise Thomas presented Mdme. Galli-Marié, with a necklace of precious stones.

The committee of the Mold National Eisteddfod have had a reply from his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in which he states that it is with great regret that he cannot comply with the prayer of a memorial, so influentially signed, and be President for one day. The Eisteddfod will most likely be held in the fourth week in August, as originally intended.

There have been several rehearsals at St. Petersburgh of the "Retraite Militaire," including drummers and trumpeters. 2,600 musicians will take part in it, and it has been found no easy matter to get this vast number of men to play well together; the last rehearsal, however, was a great success, and if they play equally well at the public performance the effect will be magnificent.

The Independence Belgé says:—"Several Parisian journals have stated that M. Gounod's new opera, Polyeucte will be produced at Vienna, during the Exhibition, under the eminent composer's direction. This is inexact. M. Gounod is too busy, just now with Jeanne d'Arc to find time for rehearsals of Polyeucte. The truth is that M. Gounod will spend some time at Vienna, and that he will take advantage of his visit to bring out some of his latest religious works, particularly his Requiem and Pater Noster, which the English public have received with enthusiasm."

Now that the season is finished, we may thank the proprietors of the Queen's Theatre, Manchester, for the opportunity they have again afforded the public of hearing some of the most charming works of the Italian lyric stage; and, as their house seems to be accepted both by artists and the public as the local home of the opera, we would suggest the desirability of this year's example being adhered to, and a short series of opera being given annually, immediately before and after the close of the ordinary local musical season. We are sure, from the interest the public have shown in these representations, that the plan we have suggested would meet with approbation.—Manchester Guardian.

The Allgemeine Zeitung of the 16th of April has an article upon Swinburne's Byron, and detailed quotations from the preface of the new edition, in which the hope is expressed that "something at once new and true" may one day be brought to light concerning Byron's life. "However, this, like much else besides, lies in the lap of the gods, and especially in the lap of one goddess, who still treads the earth. Till she speaks we cannot guess what she may have to say." To this phrase the editor adds: "Countess Guiccioli has died meanwhile without divulging anything." Now (says Mr. Karl Hillebrand, writing to us from Florence), I have had the privilege of looking through the whole of the extremely valuable manuscript collection left by the Countess, which is still in the possession of her family. It contains, besides the MS. of a work on "Byron's stay in Italy," by the Countess, which is full of unpublished letters and contemporary notices, a quantity of Lord Byron's autograph manuscripts (for instance, of Marino Faliero, several cantatas of Don Juan, Dante's Prophecy, &c.), and, what is a good deal more important, an extensive correspondence, dating from 1820 to 1823, which, however, is hardly adapted for publication.

In Milan comedy is performed not so much on the stage as in the house, an instance of which the following two facts will give. A young girl from the provinces made her début in a small theatre as Lady Anne, in Shakespere's Richard III., and when throwing herself forward, with great emphasis, she exclaimed: "When shall I have peace?" At once a voice was heard in the gallery: "Not before you shall have paid the two livres twenty-five which you owe me for washing!" Whether the effect of this dialogue or of the piece was at the moment more striking may readily be imagined, But more astonishing, though practical for all that, is the following contract entered into by two enthusiastic amateurs: The opera given was the work of a young composer. The work delighted a gentleman in the audience to a high degree, but his neighbour was to the same degree displeased with the music. Everybody knows what a quiet people the Italians are when their blood is up, and it can therefore readily be imagined to what extent the one screamed, with all the extent of his lungs, "B-r-ravo, bravissimo," while the other got nearly consumptive from whistling through his fingers, his door-key, and similar contrivances very ordinarily used for Italian theatrical demonstrations. However, mortal nature's strength is limited, and after two acts both combatants were exhausted. Then the friend of the composer turned around to his neighbour and said: "I see you cannot breathe from exhaustion, whistling all the while, and my hands are positively smaller, I can no more applaud. Will you change parts and applaud with all your might? I promise you I will hiss like a snake, and while you represent my opinion, I will faithfully represent yours." Being positively incapable of going on, the neighbour accepted; and so the composer's friend hissed him while his enemy applauded—nothing like practically helping each other.

A correspondent writes to an English musical journal a letter advocating the extirpation of organ-grinders. For many reasons this may properly be objected to; and chiefly because the means suggested are totally disproportionate to the desired end. Why should European organ-grinders be extirpated when the present policy of forwarding them directly to America is accomplishing the desired result so completely? Why extirpate, when you can expatriate so much more readily and at so much less expense? Then, too, there is another objection. It cannot be desirable to abolish the foundations of musical criticism as established by the disturbers of the public peace. How are we to judge properly and understandingly of our orchestras, if we have no barrel-organs with which to compare them? How shall our singers, and some of our actors, be properly appreciated and duly commended, when we are deprived of the possibility of rating them according as they approach or recede from the barbaric yawp of the vocal organ-grinder, or the grimaces and antics of the organistic monkey? The right of our proverbially blood-thirsty English friends to dispose of their tormentors as they may see fit cannot be denied, but it may be doubted if they fully appreciate how deeply indebted they are to these as a point d'appui for their critical screeds.—Arcadian.

Mdlle. Tietjens, no doubt, enjoys the exquisite trills, shakes, and quavers of her own voice, but it seems she does not like her house to perform in imitation of those tours de force. In company with 238 inhabitants of St. John's Wood, she has appealed to the Committee of the House of Commons against the proposal of the promoters of the Bill now before the House to widen the present line of railway from Baker Street to St. John's Wood, and to carry upon it the heavy traffic of the Midland and North Western Companies. Mdlle. Tietjens states (and the committee have admitted her locus standi), that she bought a house from the Company, and that it was part of the contract that the 88th section of the Bill of 1864 should be observed, to the effect that heavy traffic should not be carried along the line. The other complainants draw a piteous picture of their condition, even at present, and a fearful sketch of what it would become were heavy traffic to be permitted about their foundations. Already they were "annoyed" and "disturbed," and "shaken in their beds," and if the heavy trains come, then, assuredly, Somnus and Morpheus will for ever forsake St. John's Wood, and 238 patients will be added to the neighbouring lunatic asylums. The referees for the consideration of the case under the presidency of Mr. Bonham Carter allowed the petitioners locus standi against the 23rd clause of the Bill, and so much of the preamble as related thereto; so it is possible that, as a Persian poet would say, St. John's Wood may repose "under the canopy of a well-organised brain," and without a succession of underground traffic trains. * * * "Amongst the signatories," says the Daily Telegraph, "is Mdlle. Tietjens, who 'prays to be heard.' If she would only come to the Committee Room and sing her protest, her success would be, we should think, certain; but she has a distinct reason for her resistance. She bought a house and piece of land from the Company, and in her lease there is a guarantee that the 88th section of the original act—prohibiting heavy traffic shall be observed. It would be a serious thing for the world of song if the hours of rest or practice of such an artist were interrupted by a coal or cattle train rumbling under her drawing room, and giving her voice an unmusical shake. Perhaps a special proviso might be inserted providing for an arrest of traffic during certain hours consecrated to one of our queens of song."

More News from a Star.

Apropos of the education of children (that most important auxiliary towards human health and happiness) Hermes, to whom we are indebted for the interesting revelations from "Another World," writes as follows:—

"It is scarcely possible to overrate the importance of acting with judgment towards children. From the smallest beginnings, incurable defects of mind and permanent disease of body will gather strength, grow and obtain the mastery, till they carry off the sufferer, or implant vices that, like evil spirits, will torture the victim during his life's career. Nothing is spared in the education of the future man and mother of men. In the child is seen the parent of other generations, one who, as he is well or ill-directed, will strengthen or weaken the great work of human happiness, bearing with him a blessing or a curse for the community. Therefore, whatever may be the pains or expenditure required in the cure of incipient faults, as of incipient disease, we know that society will be repaid more than a thousand-fold in the happiness of its members, in evil prevented and good propagated, in the numbers of men of talent and genius, whose works, teeming with great results, will be thus saved to the State." THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine, (Longman & Co.,) they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from, Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

Since our last general report of the doings at this establishment there have been repetitions of Lucia, Semiramide, &c. The first performance of Rigoletto, a fine one—thanks to Sir Michael Costa and his orchestra — was the means of introducing three new comers of promise if not as yet of absolute excellence. The first, Mdlle. Ostava Torriani, is possessor of a voice young and fresh, in addition to which she has a prepossessing appearance, combined with a certain charm of manner, of itself alone a recommendation. But Mdlle. Torriani has much to learn both as singer and actress; and, in a part like Gilda, it need scarcely be added that want of experience, more especially in the former capacity, is a drawback. Nevertheless, Mdlle. Torriani presented herself before an indulgent audience. She was applauded, not only in the melodious soliloquy, "Caro nome," but wherever a fitting occasion offered itself, and, in short, received the warmest encouragement. With youth in her favour, Mdlle. Ostava Torriani may possibly become a finished lyric comedian. But all depends on her perseverance and method of study. Signor del Puente, to whom the arduous character of Rigoletto was confided, though apparently at home on the boards, and, in a dramatic sense, familiar with his work, has a barytone voice, the "timbre" of which (to employ the French accepted term) is more peculiar than telling. As a vocalist he does not exhibit all the requisites which exacting criticism demands. Nevertheless, he is in earnest, and though, in whatever he does, a certain amount of exaggeration must be taken into account, this, as he progresses, may be toned down. Rigoletto, we admit, is a professed buffoon; but, intrinsically, he is keener, cleverer, and wiser than all the courtiers put together—a fact, by the way, which was never lost sight of by Ronconi, whose Rigoletto was one of his best balanced and at the same time most striking impersonations. Signor del Puente, however, is evidently full of aspiration, and his career will be watched with interest by those to whom Italian opera—as "high mountains" to Lord Byron—is "a feeling." The third new comer, Mdlle. Justine Macvitz, has the advantage of being extremely good looking, which serves her to excellent purpose in the part of Maddalena, sister and confederate of the professional assassin, Sparafucile (Signor Pro). Further than this, her voice is a mezzo-soprano of pleasing quality, and she is already in a fair way to learn the art of using it. Her stage demeanour is graceful, and the little she had to do (Maddalena only appearing in the last scene of the opera) she did naturally and well. When it is added that Signor Mongini played the Duke, and was encored in the popular air, "La donna è mobile," all that is necessary to say of Rigoletto, Verdi's masterpiece, has been said.

Is it required of us to speak in detail about the performance of the same composer's irrepressible Trovatore, which came next in order of succession? We think not, and shall be content to record that the Leonora of Mdlle. Tietjens is still, like her greater Leonora (Fidelio), what we have long known—in its way unequalled; that Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini being indisposed, Mdlle. Macvitz undertook, at a very short notice, the part of the gipsy, Azucena; that Signor del Puente, as the Conte di Luna, made an advance in public favour, obtaining the accustomed "encore" for "Il balen del suo sorriso;" and that Signor Mongini roused the house to enthusiasm in "Ah si ben mio" the apostrophe to Leonora, which he was unanimously called upon to repeat, while its fiery sequel, "Di quella pira," declaimed and vociferated with all his well-known energy, won him a double "recall." The rest (including the usual "encore" for the "Miserere"—Tietjens and Mongini) may be taken for granted. The first night of the Trovatore invariably "draws;" and the house was one of the fullest of the season.

Martha was selected for the first appearance of Signor Campanini, whose "silvery tones," as they have been styled, and occasionally somewhat languid manner, are well suited to the lackadaisical character of Lionel. Though his voice was not precisely in very good order, Signor Campanini exerted himself strenuously, and on the whole sang his best—as was shown in the soliloquy "M'appari tutt' amor," in which Lionel extols the perfections of his lost Martha. This raised an "encore" so hearty and general that the singer had no choice left but to repeat the air. Signor Campanini acted with intelligence. In Mdlle. Ilma di Muraka, as Martha, he had a worthy companion. The gifted Hungarian puts a stamp of her own upon every character she essays. That she was compelled to give "Qui sola vergin rosa" twice will be taken for granted. Mdme. Trebelli (Nancy) was still somewhat indisposed, which necessitated the omission of the pretty duet with Plumkett, and also of the hunting song in Act III. The other encores were awarded to the "Spinning Wheel" quartet, and "Chi mi dirà," the apostrophe to beer (Act III.)—sung with remarkable verve by Signor Agnesi, almost as good a representative of Plumkett as can be remembered. Signor Borello made a capital Lord Tristan; and, for the most part, the execution of M. Flotow's opera was all that could be desired. As much may be said about the second representation of Martha, when Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, another of Mr. Mapleson's recent acquisitions, took the part of the heroine, the rest of the cast being precisely as before. Mdlle. Valleria, an American, if we are correctly informed, studied singing under Mr. Wallworth, at our Royal Academy of Music, and subsequently took lessons in the Italian school from Signor Arditi, the well-known orchestral conductor. In the concert-room she had already obtained acceptance; but this, we believe, was her first appearance on the lyric stage in England, although she has visited Italy and been honourably received. Mdlle. Valleria is favourably endowed as regards personal appearance, and for one so young moves on the boards with ease and unstudied grace. Her voice, while still not cultivated to that degree which would enable her to fulfil every condition required from a dramatic singer, is agreeable in quality, especially in the upper register; and she already evinces a facility from which much may be reasonably expected. Not to enter into further particulars, we may add that Mdlle. Valleria pleased the audience, and obtained the utmost encouragement from the beginning of the opera to the end. As a matter of course, she was called on to repeat "Qui sola vergin rosa," which she did—the second time having recourse to Moore's "Last Rose of Summer." Whereupon many of the audience expressed a desire to hear it again; but Sir Michael Costa, with good taste, would not permit of so ill a compliment to M. Flotow, who, though "The Last Rose of Summer" has contributed to the success of his most popular work on the continent, as in England, has written other pieces worthy a place in any opera of its kind.

Meanwhile, the indefatigable Mdlle. Tietjens has added another part to her extensive repertory. It might seem rather too late for her to assume the garb of the unhappy Spanish Leonora; but, as in two other Leonoras—the Leonora of Fidelio and the Leonora of the Trovatore—she has of recent years distanced all competitors, it was almost incumbent on her to complete the trilogy with the Leonora of Donizetti. She has now done so; and it is difficult to decide which of the three Leonoras is her happiest assumption—the devoted Leonora of Beethoven, the unintelligible, though exemplary, Leonora of Verdi, or the erring and repentant Leonora of Donizetti, who, like the heroine of the Traviata, would fain mend her ways when first made sensible of what true love absolutely consists. We can only say that the third Leonora of Mdlle. Tietjens is worthy its two predecessors. Finis coronat opus. Never on any occasion has the accomplished lady more emphatically established her claim to be regarded, in her line, as the first of living artists. True, the music, in several instances, is somewhat too low for her voice, having been expressly composed for Madame Rosina Stoltz, a mezzo-soprano; but, with the tact of an experienced artist, Mdlle. Tietjens knows well how to accommodate her voice to the text. Her dramatic conception of the part is admirable. A finer exhibition of histrionic power than the last scene, terminating with the death of Leonora at the feet of her compassionate lover, has rarely been witnessed.

Of Signor Aramburo, the new tenor, who appeared as Fernando, we prefer speaking on another occasion. That he possesses a legitimate tenor voice, of power and good quality, is undeniable; but about his ability to employ it advantageously there was no fair opportunity of judging until the last scene. The impassioned soliloquy, "Angiol d'amore" ("Spirito gentil"), in which Fernando, not the less enamoured because of his wrongs, dwells with eloquent expression upon the imaginary perfection he had dreamed of, was sung with true feeling, called for again, and repeated. As an actor, Signor Aramburo is at present not remarkable. His great scene with Alphonso XI., when Fernando breaks his sword and throws his insignia at the feet of the monarch who has outraged him, went for nothing—so impassive and undramatic was Signor Aramburo., Signor Mendioroz, as the king, was excellent, as usual. New scenery, costumes, and stage effects, gave additional interest to the representation; and the musical combinations, as never fails to be the case when Sir Michael Costa is in the orchestra, were all that could be wished.

That the Huguenots of Meyerbeer, with Mdlle. Tietjens at hand, should be one of the early productions of the season, might have been anticipated. Valentine was the part in which this gifted lady first appeared in London (1858), at Her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket, under the never-to-be-forgotten direction of Mr. Lumley. The effect Mdlle. Tietjens produced on that occasion must always be remembered by amateurs who were fortunate enough to be present; and now, so many years later, we find her playing the same character, with the same fire and enthusiasm. Our readers need be under no apprehension that we are about entertaining them with a fresh description of the Huguenots. We have only to say that the first performance this season at Her Majesty's Opera was, for the most part, a very fine one. Mdlle. Tietjens was herself, and being associated with Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, as Queen Margherita; Mdlle. Trebelli-Bettini, as Urban; Signor Agnesi, as St. Bris; Signor Medini, as Marcel; and Signor Campanini, as Raoul, there could be little cause for dissatisfaction—more especially as the orchestral accompaniments, so gorgeous and varied, have rarely, if ever, been more effectively given. Signor Campanini's Raoul is not precisely what some future day we hope it may become; but it has unquestionable merit. There was a great house, and the audience were more than usually demonstrative.

On Saturday Madame Christine Nilsson made her second appearance; but as the opera was the same as on Tuesday week—viz., Faust—there is no more to be said on the subject. The Huguenots was repeated on Monday night; the Traviata, for Madame Nilsson's third appearance, was given on Tuesday; and Faust, on Thursday. La Favorita is announced for this evening. More in our next.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

At the second performance of Guillaume Tell, the part of Arnoldo was assigned to Signor Mongini, who, having concluded his engagement with Mr. Mapleson, has joined the company of Mr. Gye. This gentleman, like Herr Wachtel, has all the physical means to give with due effect the declamatory passages which Rossini has put into the mouth of Arnoldo; and perhaps he has rarely achieved a more decided success. The great duet with Tell, the great duet with Mathilde; the magnificent trio with Tell and Walter, thanks to the powerful voice and energetic delivery of Signor Mongini, roused the house to enthusiasm. The Guillaume Tell of Signor Maurel was even better than on the occasion of the first performance. This is saying no little. The rest was as before.

On Saturday night Mdlle. Albani appeared as the heroine of Donizetti's Linda di Chamouni, and achieved another and a well-earned success. On the whole, the part of Linda, its exacting music and its uncommon demand on histrionic display taken into consideration, might have seemed beyond the physical means of Mr. Gye's interesting young prima donna. But Mdlle Albani went through the opera as if she had been playing the character of Linda for years past. She sang the cavatina in the first scene, "O luce di quest' anima," with no less fluency than grace; and gave due effect to the duet in which Linda indignantly repulses the advances of the designing old Marquis of Boisfleury (Signor Ciampi). In the scene where Linda proffers alms to Antonio, her father (whom she does not recognize), terminating with his malediction, Mdlle. Albani was also intensely earnest, and could hardly have been associated with an Antonio more fitted to give requisite expression to the situation than Signor Maurel. After the despairing "Non e ver," in which the half-distraught maiden expresses, in passionate strains, her disbelief of the fact that Carlo has proved false, Mdlle. Albani was thrice called before the footlights, in company with Mdlle. Scalchi, whose Pierotto is well known as one of the best of recent years. As in everything Mdlle. Albani does, there is a charm essentially her own. Signor Montanaro gave the music of Carlo (Linda's lover) like a thorough artist, and again proved himself a singer of the legitimate Italian school. The performance generally (under Signor Vianesi's conducting) was good, and the house was well attended.

The operas performed during the current week have been Masaniello, with Signor Nicolini as Masaniello (Monday); the Barbiere di Siviglia—for the first appearance of Madame Adelina Patti (Tuesday); Don Giovanni, with Madame Patti as Zerlina and M. Faure as the hero (Thursday); Masaniello (Friday); and Rigoletto (to-night)—five performances in one week.

WHAT HANDEL BORROWED.

By Dr. Ferdinand Hiller.*

Handel, also, has slain his ten thousands, and, in his case, as in that of other great victors, the public does not enquire too curiously what means he employed. He appears to have made Molière's saying: "I take my own wherever I find it," an article of faith, though he may not have been aware of the fact. Dr. Crotch, an English musician, who has set a monstrous number of pieces from Handel's oratorios in a monstrous manner for the organ, though, notwithstanding, he was no foe of the illustrious master, names an incredibly large number of composers from whom Handel borrowed motives for choruses, airs, fugues, and even entire movements. Of Germans, the Doctor names Kuhnau, Habermann, Muffet, Kerl, and Telemann; of Italians, Leo, Porta, Carissimi, Stefani, Vinci, Corelli, Buononcini, and others. The book which we are promised by Herr Chrysander will throw more light upon the subject. Though that writer may see in such borrowings, or rather in the way in which they were turned to account, only new proofs of the grandeur, which no one doubts, of his hero, it is yet not to be supposed that he will allow any to pass unless they can stand the severest scrutiny. But we will consider for a few moments the justice of such borrowings; for, however much we may forgive in genius, (and forgiveness is easy, when it goes hand in hand with admiration,) genius is still subject to the eternal laws which govern mankind.

> "Ich weiss dass mir nichts angehört
> Als der Gedanke, der ungestört
> Aus meiner Seele will fliessen,"

Goethe exclaims — and belief in that much misunderstood fact, intellectual property, was never more eloquently put. It is precisely because the thought is discovered, because it streams involuntarily from us, that we feel so deeply the fact of its belonging to us—that, indeed, we feel it is a piece of our most inward selves. Now the more strongly a man of eminently creative mind must feel this with regard to his own creations, the greater should be his respect for the property of even his humblest brother. Whatever he may achieve by what he appropriates, whatever he may, by his higher power, make of it, and present to the world, does not alter the original conditions of the case. Is the sculptor allowed to steal even a piece of rough marble, because he is capable of creating out of it the statue of a goddess?

Moreover, how much do the men whose mission it has been to close a grand period of intellectual creation—how much, I say, do they not owe the predecessors whom they have eclipsed, or even caused to be forgotten? They find ready to their hand, and at their free disposal, the means to which their predecessors only gradually attained—the forms their predecessors organically developed are at their command—they breathe a purer air, they rejoice in a brighter light, and they are nourished on stronger things. On a mass of thoughts with which the intellectual atmosphere was filled they set the seal of their own powerful individuality, and Posterity names after them an entire epoch, and looks for its characteristics in their works alone.

With this process of drawing generally on the stores offered by the Past and Present, the great composers, to return to our special case, were content. The Handelian plan of appropriation for higher purposes was, with the exception of some few and rare instances, something foreign to them. That they, however, with the daring spirit of genius could accomplish musical transubstantiation is proved by the exceptional instances in question; as, for example, the metamorphosis of a Gigue by Bach into the great air in A major in the third act of Iphigenia in Tauris by Gluck, or the light connection of Mozart's Requiem with the introductory chorus of Handel's Funeral Ode on the death of Queen Caroline. However rare high mastery may be, it is always easier to prove it on a given subject than on one self-created, if only for the reason that, in making his choice, the composer can go to work with far calmer objectivity. Many a composer has probably achieved many a triumph which he would never have obtained by the narrow path of musical virtue.

The defenders of Handel will, perhaps, cite Carl Maria von Weber, who, in his ever young opera of Der Freischütz, is said to have used certain folk-melodies and dance-tunes. At any rate, he put them in their right place. But the difference in the two cases is great, if only from the mere fact that the pieces are folk-songs—which are, perchance, common property to a greater extent than anything else. With their strongly marked local colour, they belong almost to the district in which the drama is laid, and nothing can compensate for their absence. Anything to be created to supply their place must be an imitation approximating as closely as possible to the originals, and, under such circumstances, the honourable course is to "steal." A great deal is to be said in Handel's excuse. In the first place, we may cite the sketchy way in which, at that period, many compositions were put down on paper. The figured bass challenging the musician to interweave something of his own in another's music induced him, perchance, to appropriate that music altogether as his own. In those times, too, there did not prevail that irrepressible impulse after originality which, at the present day, leads to so much musical buffoonery. Natural invention and masterly treatment were the first things required. We have utterly reversed all this. Very, very much less music was then engraved and published, and the copying of manuscript music may tend more easily to piracy, than when the music, if not cast in, is multiplied by bronze. Finally, Handel was a very great man; he could hardly scan with sufficient accuracy his far spreading seigniories to know at every moment where their boundaries lay. In the heat of the chase, he shot at his neighbour's game—and it was not often that he missed his mark.

Erba and Urio ought to be thankful, some persons may even say; has not Handel obtained for them a small immortality, which they would otherwise scarcely have achieved? Yes—the immortality of the fly in amber! Thank you. No one cares what the old gentlemen possessed; we only want to know what was taken from them and to what use it was applied. At any rate, a very degrading position.

It is not the artistically wonderful manner in which Handel turned to account what he borrowed that renders us forbearing towards his weakness; it is the fabulously rich store of his original creations which push it into the remotest background. What are his appropriations when set against his forty operas, twenty oratorios, his odes, psalms, hymns, serenades, cantatas, suites, water-music, and fire-work music? They disappear like specks of cloud in the star-spangled heavens.

I must, however, revert to one fact, though, properly speaking, it does not at all concern me. It is the comparison mentioned at the commencement of this bit of chit-chat, as instituted by Herr Chrysander, between Handel's oratorios and Shakespere's dramas. Strange; while Gervinus, the twin worshipper of Handel, endeavours in every way to elevate him out of his natural sphere, and place him side by side with the greatest of poets, Herr Chrysander drags down the latter with the same object. It was from tales, plays, chronicles, and songs that Shakespere fashioned his dramas, was it? It was out of the abundance of the richest soul that ever found a place in a human breast that he fashioned them, or, at least, those which have rendered him in our eyes a godlike seer. Though Handel's Herculean musical strength, and his intellectual clearness and freshness, as well as his heroic simplicity in the midst of all his artistic mastery, together with his musically healthy understanding, will, probably, secure for his oratorios a longer life than will fall to the lot of other, and, partially, higher musical works; the immeasurable significance belonging to Shakespere's works is something which they do not, and never can, possess. For, above tone and colour, above stone and above bronze, does the word stand with its airy sound, and, despite everything, eternal duration.

CARL MARIA VON WEBER.

(From E. Pauer's Lectures on the most Celebrated Composers for the Pianoforte in connection with General History of Music.)

The composer who has established the firmest hold upon the people's hearts is undoubtedly Carl Maria von Weber. He is in one respect, alike in England and in Germany, the people's composer. His Freischütz enjoys a greater popularity than any of Mozart's operas; some of his piano pieces are greater favourites than even the Songs Without Words of Mendelssohn; and a great many of his songs and choruses have become national in their wide diffusion. Among composers, Weber is a German of the Germans; none of his countrymen was so entirely uninfluenced by the French or Italian music as he, and it was this very independence and trust in his own powers which endeared him so much to his own countrymen, and commanded in such a high degree the respect of other nations, and especially of that French nation, at that very time, in 1813-14, engaged in mortal strife against the patriotic chivalry of the newly-awakened nationality of Germany. The melodies of Weber, set to the fiery lyrics of the patriot-poet and warrior, Theodor Korner, the Tyrtæus of the German camp, kindled the enthusiasm of the young German volunteers to absolute self-devotion. In the character of Max, in Weber's Freischütz, the Teuton recognized the symbol of the German huntsman, and in Agatha he found the picture of the tender, loving German maiden. The fresh, vigorous huntsmen's choruses again struck an answering chord, not only in German hearts, but found an echo in every manly breast in Europe. For this reason, Weber's name will ever remain as that of a composer of truly cosmopolitan fame. At the same time he is as thoroughly German as Robert Burns was Scotch, Oliver Goldsmith English, and Beranger French. Besides this striking characteristic there is another feature in Weber's music which brings with it an irresistible charm; that is, his romantic feeling. In Weber the romantic tendency is paramount; and in his three great operas, Der Freischütz, Euryanthe, and Oberon, he shows this feeling in three different phases. In the Freischütz, we are made acquainted with the romance of the hunter's life; in Euryanthe, (a work too little known in England) it is the chivalrous French romance which delights us; and in Oberon, we revel in the romance of the fairy world. It is quite natural that after the turmoil of a daily, and sometimes most uninteresting work, we should delight in a translation into the mimic world of fancy; and if such fairylike and fanciful creations are produced in such beauty as Weber can call forth, the change becomes not only refreshing, but elevating.

The elucidation of the nature of romantic music would offer a most tempting theme of speculation and general interest, if we had time to enter on a disquisition concerning the true origin of this most important feature of the musical art. But time presses, and we must perforce be satisfied with the simple observation that, generally, romanticism is understood to depend more on the fancy of the human mind than on set rules; and, that regarding its origin, it might, perhaps, be sought among the Troubadours of Provence, a class of musicians represented in England by the Minstrels, and in Germany by the Minnesänger. Englishmen cherish as a graceful historic recollection the charming episode of Richard Cœur de Lion and his faithful Blondel. But I must refrain from entering on this most interesting subject, and return to my task of pointing out the position of Weber in musical history.

It cannot be asserted that either Bach or Handel, Mozart or Haydn, and, least of all, Beethoven, influenced Weber. Owing to an irregular education, Weber never mastered the rules of composition to such an extent as to acquire a systematic, regular, and even style, and such a continuity as we admire in the works of the above-mentioned masters. Amongst the great composers, Weber alone is fragmentary and rhapsodical. His episodes sometimes appear to have no clear or decisive reasons; each of his andantes or his overtures possesses as much material as Mozart or Haydn would have required for two andantes or two overtures. With regard to the overtures, however, it must be admitted that Weber desired to present in each a kind of musical prologue, indicating the main character of the opera; and, indeed, his unfulfilled intention to explain the mystery which hangs over the story of Euryanthe by the overture, combined with an apparition on the stage curtain, is a highly artistic and refined device. Strange to say, the world is generally unaware that an idea, for which it gave credit to Meyerbeer, in his Pardon de Ploermel, belongs by right to Weber, who could not execute it from want of efficient stage arrangements.

But the fragmentary style, which, according to the true laws of the art, could be considered a reproach to Weber, is, under the circumstances, not a fault. Whenever he breaks off he is sure to introduce a phrase of such singular beauty, and such subtle charm, that the hearer is almost glad of its appearance, and readily forgives the unobservation of logical principles. With regard to harmonious changes, Weber is mostly very happy; there is in his modulations a highly pleasing euphony, to which, however, power and spirit are never sacrificed. The application of his fundamental bass is sometimes very defective and faulty, his part writing is in some instances forced and clumsy. The accompaniments, again, are not always in true relation to the melodies; all these defects arise from the want of a proper, regular, and patient training. But what are these deficiences when compared to the high qualities of which his works can boast? For richness, fire, enthusiasm, he is as distinguished as for tenderness, grace, and sweetness of feeling. Besides, the conclusion of his overtures and sonatas displays a climax which carries us on with an irresistible might, and in which he is unparalleled, if we accept a single instance—and that is Beethoven's third overture to Leonora.

For Weber's contributions to pianoforte literature—the works which claim our more immediate attention here—we cannot be too thankful. The piano seems under his hand transformed into a new instrument. Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, and Thalberg have so largely profited by the initiative taken by Weber, that it is but bare justice to point out the improvements we owe directly to him. Before Weber, Dussek was the first who used the chords up to the interval of the tenth. Weber accepted this treatment almost unconditionally; but whilst the sentimentality of Dussek leads to a cumbrous oppressive heaviness, Weber's healthy enthusiasm retains a greater richness, and brings out every effect with a clear and transparent flow. Weber is the first who emancipated the left hand entirely from the right. For example, in the slow movement of his second sonata the left hand sometimes represents the part of a tenor (or baritone) singer, whilst the right hand indicates the higher (treble) voice. Again, he is the first who applied, in an artistic manner, the peculiarly charming effect of accompanying the melody with the shortest possible chords, so as to throw, as it were, the chief singing quality into the right hand, which executes the theme. He also invented the modern valse; his ever fresh "Invitation à la Valse" marks the dawn of a new era. To the Polonaise he imparted its true character. If we compare all the Polonaises written before or during his time with that splendid, brilliant, chivalrous Polonaise of Weber's in E major, we shall find them tame and insipid indeed. In short, Weber infused into the piano a new soul; like Beethoven, he extracted from it a richness of sound which bids fair to rival the majestic strains of the organ; he makes an instrument, deemed cold and passionless till then, discourse tender love, and so assists in rendering it what it became with Chopin, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, the exponent of the innermost emotions of the soul.

It is not astonishing that Weber's innovations were not by any means readily accepted by his contemporaries; neither Hummel nor Cramer put much faith in his doctrines. Both pronounced his works incongruous, badly constructed, difficult to finger, and impracticable in design. But posterity did justice to Weber; and his Concertstück, his two Polonaises, his Invitation à la Valse, and his Rondo in E flat, enjoy a popularity rivalling that of Beethoven's Sonatas and Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words. In personal character Weber was one of the most amiable of men. Weak health, indeed, made him sensitive and irritable; but he was so sincere, and so thoroughly noble-minded, that his failings only endeared him the more to his friends—they were so thoroughly a part of the man.

On modern music Weber had a decided influence. Not only, as we have stated, have Schumann, Chopin, and Mendelssohn largely profited by his originality, but his influence on the talented opera composer, Marschner, and on the celebrated Richard Wagner, is undeniable. None of his works, indeed, will bear comparison with Beethoven's creations. They would not stand this severe test; and it seems that Weber himself was aware of the colossal greatness of his contemporary, though he was not at all sympathetically inclined towards Beethoven, and even uttered some very injudicious remarks about the "confusion" which pervades Beethoven's style. But when these remarks escaped him, Weber was only twenty-three years old, and in riper years he shewed, in an unmistakable manner, that his opinion had changed; and when Leonora was brought out in Dresden under his direction, he took the greatest possible care to render the performance of the opera worthy of its celebrated composer.

HANDEL'S "BELSHAZZAR."

Those who looked with apprehension upon what is called the "progress" of music in our day may find some comfort in the avidity with which ancient masterpieces are hunted up and once more brought out to the light. The advanced school of musical faith and practice is, in truth, but one development among several of the restless spirit which pervades that particular domain of modern thought. It has its correlative and its corrective in the revived attention paid to the great works of the past—an attention which seems, year by year, to increase both its force and the area of its operations. How completely Bach has been resuscitated of late there is no need to tell; while, as regards Bach's great contemporary, Handel, an obvious disposition exists not only to know more about him where he is already known, but to make his music familiar where hitherto it has not penetrated. Readers of foreign musical news must, latterly, have been struck with this fact; and it behoves England, the Handelian country par excellence, to see that in comprehensive acquaintance with the master's works it keeps the place so long held by right of passionate regard for his genius. Of late years not much has been done to extend a knowledge of Handel among us; the societies upon which this task naturally devolves contenting themselves with the regular presentation of a few of his greatest works. Happily there arose the "Oratorio Concerts"—now merged with the Albert Hall Society—and Jephtha was revived amid lively marks of public satisfaction. To the same energy and artistic zeal we are now indebted for the awaking of Belshazzar from a sleep of twenty-five years—that time having elapsed since it was produced by the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of the late Mr. Surman, who, whatever his faults as a conductor, was not one of the "rest and be thankful" school. Handel's tenth oratorio may lack the sublimity of the Messiah, the grandeur of Israel in Egypt, and the patriotic enthusiasm of Judas Maccabæus; but, even apart from the fact that nothing inspired by genius should die, it deserves revival, because it contains some of the master's noblest efforts—"thunderbolts" like those which extorted the admiration of Beethoven for the greatest of musical Vulcans. Doubtless, the work has drawbacks, and it is equally beyond question that these will keep Belshazzar out of the highest class of public favourites; but the drawbacks are not so much Handel's fault as the fault of the libretto. Charles Jennens, Esq., of Gopsall Hall, may have been a great personage in his day—none but a great personage would ride from Bloomsbury to Fleet Street in a carriage and four simply to correct "proofs"—but he was a bad poet, and a worse dramatist. His bad poetry appeared in the "Il Moderato," which he associated with the "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" of Milton; and his worse dramatism is shown in the book of Belshazzar. As an oratorio libretto, nothing could be less happy than this. It opens with some trite moralising by Nitocris, Belshazzar's Queen, who is made an eminently religious person and a decided "bore." Next, a certain Gobrias is introduced, bearing a deadly grudge against Belshazzar for some reason which enters not at all into the plot. Cyrus is made a conscious instrument in the hands of the Jewish God, about whom he knew nothing, or, knowing, cared nothing; and, alone among the characters introduced, Daniel stands out as something like a truthful as well as heroic figure. The action is even more absurd than, on the whole, are the dramatis personæ. In proof of this only one example need be cited. At the crisis of the story, when Daniel has interpreted the writing on the wall to the terrified monarch, and the situation is one of almost agonising interest, Mr. Jennens puts up Nitocris with a maternal lecture, which ends the scene! True, we get another glimpse of Belshazzar after the entry of Babylon by Cyrus; but then he is flourishing his sword, and crying, "Cyrus, come on!" like a drunken Macbeth. Handel, familiar as he was with bad books, must have suppressed a good deal of "noble rage" when setting this. True, he wrote, his thanks to Jennens for what he called "a very fine and sublime oratorio;" but Handel was a needy impresario, and Jennens a "person of quality" and a patron of genius. The master did not give much time to the composition of Belshazzar, though he appears to have refrained almost entirely from "paste and scissors;" and the result is an overture distinguished by one of Handel's clearest and most spirited fugues, a number of airs and solo pieces, none of which can claim high rank, save a masterpiece of florid composition, entitled "The leafy honours of the field," and a succession of choruses that are alone warrant for the occasional performance of the whole. It is upon these choruses that the claims of Belshazzar chiefly rest, and no claims could have a better foundation. Every great quality in Handel's choral writing is here exemplified. We have the picturesque in the defiant taunt of the Babylonians, "Behold, by Persia's hero made;" the profoundly religious in the comments of the captive Jews upon what happens around them; and the bacchanal in the wine-inspired utterances of Belshazzar's Court; while the dramatic element pervading all reaches the highest conceivable climax in the expression of horror and dismay which follow the appearance of the supernatural writing. As examples of contrapuntal skill, some of the choruses have few superiors in the works of their author, but nothing is sacrificed to mere scholasticism. Handel, better than any man before or since, knew how to make science the handmaid of imagination; and here, while science is splendidly conspicuous, imagination reigns supreme. In the scene of Belshazzar's banquet, Handel put forth all his strength as a matter of course. Doing so, he rose to the demands of a tremendous situation, though encumbered by Mr. Jennens' muse, and showed himself what none will dispute his right to be called —a prince among dramatic composers.

Digitized by Google

The musical world is much indebted to Mr. Barnby and the Albert Hall Choral Society for producing Belshazzar on Wednesday week, and for doing so in a manner that invested the occasion with special importance. Mr. Barnby did not follow a recent example of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and abstain from "cuts" but—though freely and wisely using the knife—he presented the work according to Handel's "score," the only supplement being an organ part, written with much taste by Mr. G. A. Macfarren. The effect was strictly Handelian, and, if somewhat colourless to those familiar with the vivid hues of modern orchestration, it had an interest, antiquarian and other, more than sufficient to justify the experiment. Most of the choruses were given in a manner extremely creditable to the conductor and his subordinates, bearing in mind the novelty of the work; and the solos, though marred to some extent by the accident of indisposition, challenged a good deal of applause. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington's delivery of the florid air above referred to was a masterpiece of vocal skill. The music requires extraordinary facility and consummate judgment—qualities which Madame Lemmens added to the effect of her pure soprano tones in achieving a remarkable success. Cyrus had an excellent representative in Madame Patey, all his solos, but especially his recitatives, being given with rare dignity of style and artistic power. Mr. Cummings, for whom indulgence was asked, on account of hoarseness, sang the music of Belshazzar with spirit and unfailing good taste; and Mr. Patey must be warmly commended for taking the place of Mr. Lewis Thomas, whom illness compelled to retire, and for singing the important music of Daniel with much acceptance. Mr. Thurley Beale represented Gobrias in a manner as efficient as unobtrusive. It is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Barnby conducted well, or that Dr. Stainer was a capital organist.

ALBERT HALL CONCERTS.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

With the return of spring the morning concerts of the great halls and palaces of the "Crystal" type are beginning. The first of the opera-concerts at the Floral Hall took place on Saturday week; the summer series of opera-concerts at the Crystal Palace commenced last Saturday; the new Alexandra Palace opens with a concert of unusual magnitude, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, on Saturday next; and during the last fortnight performances of music, for the most part classical, and all of a high character, have been given daily at the Albert Hall.

The Albert Hall concerts are under the conductorship of Mr. Barnby, and, though chiefly orchestral, do not exclude vocal music. The managers are Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co.; and programmes of each concert, or, at least, a large number of programmes, have been issued, bearing interesting and valuable annotations by Mr. Joseph Bennett. Some analysis of works elaborately constructed, some account of the origin of works holding a recognized place in the history of musical art, are now looked for in connection with all concert schemes of importance; and Mr. Bennett's elucidatory criticism is just what is wanted to increase the interest of amateurs in compositions which, however eloquent in themselves, say something more than they themselves contain to hearers informed as to the particular circumstances under which they were originally produced. Mr. Barnby's orchestra, fifty strong, includes some distinguished professors among the soloists, and is generally well composed. Playing daily the same pieces, or pieces of the same kind, under the same conductor, the well-balanced little band may be expected to attain the same sort of excellence that has long distinguished the band of the Crystal Palace. Each programme, as a rule, contains a symphony or concerto and two overtures, with or without vocal music; so that in the course of the six months during which the first series of these "orchestral performances" is to last, not only may every master be fully represented, but every great instrumental work in existence might be produced. The managers profess to give these concerts "with a view to an adequate exposition of the art of music, and generally to its advancement in this country;" and, really, such an opportunity of acquiring familiarity with the masterpieces of music has never been placed within reach of the English or of any other public before. The concerts are not given on the supposition that subscribers will attend them daily. They will probably, however, attract a certain number of regular frequenters, to whom the performances will be, in regard to music, what a course of reading would be in regard to literature. For this reason it might be advisable to systematize the programme; giving, for instance, the symphonies of the great masters separately and consecutively, master by master, in historical order. An inhabitant of Kensington or the neighbourhood devoting an hour or two to the hearing of orchestral music every day for six months, would at the end of that period have heard about as much as a subscriber to the Philharmonic Concerts hears in a quarter of a century. It is obvious, too, that during that time he might, in the way of purely orchestral pieces, hear everything remarkable that music has produced. Such a persistent listener would, at the end of his course, laugh at the pretensions of Philharmonic subscribers to be considered connoisseurs on the strength of having sat out some six or eight symphonies year after year. Indeed, if the best orchestral music be worth hearing at all, it must be worth hearing much more frequently than one has the opportunity of hearing it now. The native and foreign aristocrats of Vienna, for whom Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven wrote their quartets, were in the habit of hearing chamber music every day; but owing, no doubt, to the expense of getting together a number of suitable players, also to bad management and want of faith in the music itself, it has never been customary to offer to the public in general—nor to a select and highly-charged public, except at rare intervals—those symphonies and overtures which must have been written for large audiences, as quartets were written for a certain number of aristocratic connoisseurs.

With six performances a-week it would be inexcusable not to give specimens of every kind of orchestral music held in fair esteem; and Wagner, Liszt, Brahms, are all mentioned among the composers whose works are to be presented at Mr. Barnby's concerts. As for Schumann, he is already counted among the classics. "The works of acknowledged great masters, from Sebastian Bach to Schumann, will of course be largely drawn upon," says the prospectus. Finally, with a view to the encouragement of musical composition in England, we are assured that particular attention will be paid to the works of native composers. It is even said that "prominence" will be given to them. Hitherto this excellent idea seems only to have been carried out in so far as regards compositions by Mr. Sullivan, whose beautiful Tempest music figures in one of the programmes. It appears, however, that a number of new works have been sent in at the invitation of Her Majesty's Commissioners, and that these, with others which may hereafter be submitted, "will, if found worthy, be publicly performed." Opportunities, too, are to be offered to "young English artists" (and young foreign artists also, without doubt) of making known their talent, vocal or instrumental; so that these well-planned concerts may do good in many more ways than one. "Recitals" of opera are, as a rule, uninteresting, and they rarely serve to give a correct idea of the work "recited." It is proposed, however, to reserve certain Wednesdays (not yet fixed) for this kind of performance. Wagner, it may be presumed, will be the chief sufferer at these "recitals." He is just the composer who, to be heard at his best—indeed, to be heard at all—should be heard on the stage, with all the scenic appliances of which his works stand so much in need. For which reason he is always presented to us in fragments at concerts.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The first appearance of that universal favourite, Madame Adelina Patti, has been for many years the crowning event of the season. So it proved to be again on Tuesday night last, when the house was crowded to the ceiling. Boxes, stalls, amphitheatre, and galleries were all full; and an audience more determined to be pleased has rarely assembled in a theatre. The first glimpse of the great artist, when she showed her face at the balcony window, was the signal for a burst of hearty recognition, and when she came forward in the drawing-room scene she was literally overwhelmed with applause. Her delivery of the famous soliloquy, "Una voce poco fa," which no singer in our remembrance has ever rendered with such dramatic point and meaning or with such wonderful vocal dexterity, at once secured her triumph—as it has often done before. Madame Patti embellishes this "cavatina" as profusely as any of her predecessors or contemporaries; but whatever ornaments she introduces are in admirable keeping (as Rossini himself admitted); and if that were not strictly the case, her manner of executing them is finished to such perfection that even the most obdurate stickler for the text of the master in its integrity could hardly find anything to criticize. Equally good was the duet with Figaro, "Dunque io son,"—in which the finesse and captivating grace of Madame Patti are quite on a level with her singing—higher praise than which could hardly be awarded. The handing over to Figaro of the billet which the intriguing "factotum" was so anxious to persuade her to write, and, which, to his astonishment, he finds already written, was a master-stroke which only a consummate mistress of her art could achieve with such perfect ease and spontaneity. In the "Lesson Scene" Madame Patti introduced the celebrated "valse" of Venzano, years ago made notorious by the facile execution of Madame Gassier. This was given by Madame Patti with a fluency, verve, and brilliancy rarely excelled. We need hardly add that she roused the house to enthusiasm, the result being an encore as unanimous as it was hearty. Instead of repeating the air of Venzano, however, Madame Patti acknowledged the compliment by a delivery of the English ballad, "Home, sweet home," as unaffected and exquisite as could be dreamt of. This also the audience would fain have heard again; but the gifted songstress was obdurate (wherein she exhibited good taste), and so the opera went on without further interruption in its melodious course. In conclusion, Madame Patti's voice was never in finer condition; her vocalization was never more finished; her acting never more impulsive, sympathetic, and true to nature. Such a Rosina as hers has seldom, if ever, been matched. A more triumphant "rentrée" could not have been desired, even by the accomplished lady's most ardent admirers.

The other characters were sustained as before.

MR. RIDLEY PRENTICE'S CONCERT.

An excellent entertainment of classical music was given on Wednesday evening in Hanover Square Rooms by Mr. Ridley Prentice, assisted by Miss Katherine Poyntz, Mdme. Patey, Mr. W. H. Cummings, vocalists; Messrs. Lazarus, Henry Holmes, Folkes, Hann, Reed, and Pettit, instrumentalists. A good audience assembled, and were right well regaled; first, by Schubert's fragmentary Quartet, in C minor, and then, in due order, by Mendelssohn's Variations in D major, for piano and violin; Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata; two violin solos by H. Holmes and Beethoven respectively; Weber's Duo Concertante in E flat, for piano and clarionet; Prout's Pianoforte Quintet in G major; and one of the Noveletten of Schumann. Truly, "a feast of fat things;" and, adequately served as it was, nothing but satisfaction resulted. Mr. Prentice made his greatest effect—though he played admirably throughout—in the Sonata of Beethoven. A perfect artistic spirit animated this performance, and was allied to cultivated executive powers. Naturally, therefore, Mr. Prentice achieved a complete success, and established his claim to rank among the best of our native pianists, which is saying not a little, now that we are getting to know more and more of the foreigners. Mr. Prentice was capitally supported by the capital artists we have named, and the entire concert passed off well.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

The works performed at these concerts during the present week have been Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the Concertstück of Weber (Chevalier de Kontski), the overtures to Hérold's Pré aux Clercs, Gounod's Mock Doctor, Weber's Der Freischütz, Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, and a ballet air from Schubert's Rosamunde, besides various songs, &c. On Friday and Saturday last an appearance was made by the first of the young English artists whom the concerts are intended so largely to help. The débutante in question was Mr. W. Henry Thomas (son of the well-known basso of that ilk), who played Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in C (No. 14) with entire success. A work better adapted to test his powers could hardly have been chosen, inasmuch as it demands extreme facility combined with refined taste and expression. These demands, it is no exaggeration to say, were met by Mr. Thomas in a style which spoke volumes for his musicianship and executive skill. Mr. Thomas is an élève in a good school. His playing is unexaggerated and unaffected, not seeking to perch the performer upon the composer's shoulders, but seeking rather to act the secondary part of a faithful and reverent interpreter. Let the young man persevere along the good road he has begun to travel; at the other end of it there assuredly will be found all the honour which a true artist craves.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

The theatrical season, which ended with a varied programme for the benefit of the chorus-singers, on Thursday last, began on July 2, 1872. Since that date—no less than 180 nights—the house (or, as it is called here, La Salle Monsigny) has been open.

The first four months, devoted mostly to opera, consisted of 68 nights, during which there were produced 13 grand operas, 15 operas comique, 2 operas bouffe, 5 operettas, and 6 vaudevilles. The principal artists engaged for the same period being Mesdmes. Lebel, Guerin, Papin, Muret-Mézéray, Cézar, and Fontenay Ladois; Messrs. Ketten, Millet, Colomb, Viard, Bresson, Horeb, Fronty, Kinnel, Depoitiers, and Feitlinger.

From October 31 till Feb. 27, the Saison d'hiver was mostly dramatic. On 71 nights were produced 72 vaudevilles, 1 opera bouffe, 1 opera comique, 2 operettas. Artists, Mesdames Petit, Lejeune, Daubrey, and Faigle; Messrs. de Palfrey, Magrim, Gaston, Moreau, Lodève, Caron, and Karf.

March 1 to May 8, "opera encore," 20 premières representations, consisting of 12 grand operas, 4 operas comiques, and 4 vaudevilles. Artists, Madame Depoitiers, Noaille, Champenois, Geraldine, Faigle; Messrs. Bresson, Fronty, Depoitiers, Kinnel, and Bouraud.

It would, of course, be of no use to think of much detail on the above figures and facts relating to the pieces produced, repeated, applauded, and otherwise received; but I may mention that among the best received, and, therefore, more frequently "on the boards," were Romeo and Juliette, M. Ketten as Romeo, Mdlle. Lebel, the heroine; Les Huguenots, M. Horeb as Marcel; Docteur Crispin (Crispino e la Comare); and last, not least, Hamlet, Fronty impersonating the "black Prince," and Kinnel the father, whose spirit is moved to "appear again" after his farewell (during this season, not "for one night only," but for six and a benefit) on a terrace, in the small hours of morning, under the influence of much chalk on his physiognomy and the lime light.

Digitized by Google

I must now run down the scale, and, after relating how grand operas, &c., were received, record the fact that on Friday last, about 10 a.m., large posters were seen on every available space announcing that an English circus troupe would give performances on the following three days. On each occasion the tent (I was nearly writing "house") was crammed, and that, too, with all the élite of Boulogne. You see, the "season" was a short one, and then we had a big drum, two cornets, an ophicleide, and French horn, by way of orchestra. Parafin lamps on a hoop ("and smelt so—pah!") instead of gas, and other refinements appertaining to the "ring," the sawdust, and the merry (?) clown—which are not at the Salle Monsigny, or the Etablissement—It takes a month's hard work to "get up" a concert of good music, with good artists, and the number of nights the theatre was really full during the whole season might be numbered in "units." Well, "Chaqu'un à son gout," and "Chaqu'un a son gout!" and I don't think much of that of the Boulognaises.

. "After the circus was over" I was returning with the crowd through a narrow street, on a corner wall of which the moon (suddenly appearing from behind a cloud) shone brightly on a blue poster thereto affixed. The word "circus" in large black letters caught my eye, and I visibly shivered (it was a cold night), for suddenly from behind the blue poster burst forth a piece of a yellow one, and, in large type, the word Hamlet appeared. I fully expected the "ghost" to appear also, but the moon which might have "promoted" the scene and lent her aid (like a limelight), suddenly disappeared, and so did I (to-bed). S. C.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

As already announced in these columns, the Society of the Friends of Music gave two grand concerts on the 4th and 11th inst. respectively. The programme of the first—the Schubert concert—contained the following compositions by Schubert: Symphony in B minor (two movements); Sei mir gegrüsst, "Liebesbotschaft," and "Ungeduld," sung by Herr Walter; "Litanei," and "Der Friede sei mit Euch," sung by the Vocal Association; "Mädchen's Klage," and "Gretchen am Spinnrade," sung by Mdlle. Ehnn; "Der Entfernten," and "Mondenschein," sung by the Vienna Association for Male Voices. Furthermore, the band played two Marches, and Herr Lewinsky spoke a "Festgruss," written by Dr. Mosenthal. The vocal portion of the concert was conducted by Herr Kremser, and the instrumental, by Herr Dessoff. The programme of the other concert comprised only works by Beethoven; they were: Leonore Overture, No. 3; "Adelaide," sung by Herr Walter; Air from Fidelio, sung by Madame Wilt; and Ninth Symphony, the solos being sung by Mesdames Wilt, Friedrich-Materna, Herren Walter and Krauss. The whole was under the direction of Herr Dessoff.

"Better late than never," says the proverb. Though Madame Adelina Patti is now in London, singing at the Royal Italian Opera, our readers may still be interested at learning some of the particulars connected with her benefit at the Theatre an der Wien. Never had such an audience collected within the building, and never had such a welcome been accorded to any other artist. Madame Patti appeared for the first time as the heroine in Dinorah. Immediately after the first air a perfect avalanche of flowers, wreaths, and nosegays were flung upon the stage. At the conclusion of the act there was another such avalanche, accompanied by thunders of applause. But all this was nothing compared to the outburst of enthusiasm after the "Shadow Dance," which the fair artist, at the unanimous desire of the whole audience, had to repeat. Numerous gifts were then handed up to her from out the orchestra. Among them was one from the Concordia, a club of literary men and journalists. It consisted of a splendid wreath from the workshops of Herr H. A. Granichstädten, Court Jeweller. On the leaves, surrounded by golden fruit, are engraved the titles of the lady's greatest parts: Gilda, Dinorah, Rosina, Violetta, Leonore, Elvira, Linda, Amina, Zerlina, Martha, Norma, and Margaretha. A bow, on which are engraved her arms, bears the inscription: "The Concordia club of Viennese journalists and authors, to the popular favourite and artist, Adelina Patti, Marquise de Caux. Vienna, 23rd April, 1873." The wreath rested upon a blue velvet cushion, embroidered in gold, the whole being enclosed in an elegant case. In addition to this, Mdme. Patti was presented with a magnificent Jardinière, borne by angels; bouquets enveloped in real lace; and laurel wreaths without end. As each of these objects was handed up, the orchestra blew a flourish, and the audience rose from their seats. Madame Patti appeared completely overpowered by this manifestation of popular esteem.

BEETHOVIANA.

Beethoven had in his possession a complete set of quartet string instruments made by the best Italian masters. The unique and invaluable collection was presented to him by Prince Lichnowsky, through the influence of Herr Schuppanzigh, the leader of the celebrated Quartet Society of Vienna. Aloys Fuchs* in the journal Wiener Sontag Blätter (Sunday leaves of Vienna), records the following in regard to this four instruments.

1. A violin by Joseph Guarnerius, 1718, which came into the possession of Herr Carl Holz, in Vienna, director of the "Concerts Spirituel."
2. Another violin by Nicolous Amati, 1667, of which Dr. Ohmeyer became the owner, and which his successors sold to Herr Huber, at Vienna.
3. A tenor by Vicenzo Augiero, 1670, which also became the property of Herr Holz, in Vienna.
4. A violoncello by Andrew Guarnerius, 1712, which afterwards belonged to Herr Wertheimer of Vienna.

On all these four instruments Beethoven affixed his seal, and engraved a capital B on the bottom of each instrument. The violin by Guarnerius was considered the most valuable of the collection; and in vain, 1500 florins were offered for it to the proprietor many years ago. What a price would they realize at the present time if the whole set could be brought together and could be purchased by a wealthy admirer of such a great genius?

Very interesting, and most likely unknown but to very few, is the fact that, in the year 1821, the eminent music publisher at Vienna, Tobias Haslinger, an enthusiastic admirer of Beethoven, undertook to have copied the compositions of this sublime master, from his earliest time up to the above-mentioned date. The whole collection formed 51 vols., which occupied 4000 sheets of music paper. A superior copyist of music was fully engaged upon the undertaking for four years, and Beethoven himself authenticated this codex.

Professor Anton Schindler, an intimate friend and biographer of Beethoven, was in possession of a large collection of his autographic compositions and other valuable subjects, viz., the so-called "Conversation-Books," most of them written with lead pencil, consisting of questions and answers, during Beethoven's deafness, with his friends and visitors, and also the highly interesting original scores in autograph of his two great musical compositions, the Ninth Symphony and Mass in D, which are preserved at the Royal Library in Berlin.

The Prussian Government bought these treasures for an equivalent, by granting Professor Schindler 300 thalers per annum during his life-time. DR. FERDINAND RAHLES.

Malvern House, Queen's Terrace, Grove Street Road, South Hackney, May, 1873.

* We may rely upon the statement of so distinguished a critic in musical matters, and such an author as Aloys Fuchs. He was also celebrated for his collection of autographs of the most celebrated composers of all nations, not only consisting of fragments but of complete musical works. In the lapse of 15 years, he had managed, through a wide-spread and numerous connection, to become possessed of more than 650 original compositions, viz.: 25 French, 28 English, 176 Italian, and 457 German. His collection of portraits consisting of singers, composers, virtuosi, had from its excellence gained him great repute. Both collections, with the greatest liberality, were open for the inspection of artists, amateurs and their friends.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1873.

OBSERVERS of musical doings at the Crystal Palace must have been struck with the change which has virtually abolished the once popular "Opera Concerts." The change is certainly for the better, because the Opera Concerts were not worth much. A number of artists, more or less famous, sang in a place where few could hear; and a number of people, chiefly ladies, gathered to look at them and each other. No doubt the whole affair was quite harmless. The artists knew that they could not be heard, and took matters very coolly; while the audience knew beforehand that they could not hear, and were quite content to use their eyes. In brief, the Opera Concerts afforded a pretext for a number of people to come together, by supplying them with a nominal kind of object; and, so far, there was nothing to be said against them. But—hey, presto!—the Opera Concert has vanished. No longer is Mr. Manns' band a little oasis in the desert of the great orchestra; no longer does the area of the central transept glow with the fashionable colours of the day; and no longer do foreign birds of song faintly warble like very tiny canaries in a gigantic aviary. Instead, thereof, the winter concert-room is now the summer concert-room also; and the summer concerts are very much like the winter concerts, differing only by virtue of a slight concession to delicate fashionable stomachs, which cannot well digest strong meats. The change is far the better, and, no doubt, has a certain significance. Each year shows a marked improvement in public taste, and a greater acquaintance with, therefore a greater appreciation of, the masterpieces of musical art. That the Crystal Palace managers should note this fact, and take advantage of it, was quite in keeping with the shrewdness to which they have accustomed us. Hence, we may look upon the change they have made as reflecting a corresponding change among the mass of those for whom music hath charms. But it would not be wise to invest the matter with a great amount of significance. Fashion is like the channel of a tidal river opening to the great tidal wave. Now it runs between these banks of sand; now between those; and can never be depended on long together. Has the fashion which supports opera concerts shown a tendency to leave the Crystal Palace, and disport itself in the Floral or Albert Halls, which are nearer of access, and present quite as good an opportunity for staring at opera artists in mufti, and criticising one another's dresses? This, at all events, would seem to be the case, and the crowds who go at fortnightly intervals to Bow Street and Kensington Gore give us pause in our eagerness to believe the great advance of real musical taste, to which a few collateral circumstances point. But as regards the Crystal Palace, there is reason for nothing but congratulation. In this case even the whims of fashion fight for the Sydenham Palace, as the stars fought against Sisera, and have succeeded in thrusting upon its summer music the grand distinction of classical excellence. Henceforth the great glass house will be the home of the great composers all the year round, with Mr. Manns as a perennial master of the ceremonies, and Mr. Grove as an untiringly hospitable host. How many amateurs will join us in heartily felicitating all concerned upon this state of things? It "keeps the ball a-rolling" for them throughout the circle of the year; keeps up the prestige of the Sydenham Saturdays, and—the fashionables having drifted elsewhere—satisfies everybody else.

JAMES HENRY BROWN.

OUR obituary column of last week announced the death of Mr. James Henry Brown, who for a quarter of a century held the office of Secretary to the Gloucester Musical Festival. The columns of the Musical World have upon each occasion of the triennial meetings of the Three Choirs, for many years past, borne testimony to the untiring zeal, business-like ability, and uniform courtesy of the gentleman whose decease has been so recently recorded; and the writer, speaking from a personal knowledge of even longer date than Mr. Brown's connection with the Festivals, can add his tribute to the many sterling qualities of head and heart which endeared him to all who were fortunate enough to enjoy the privilege of his friendship. For considerably more than 40 years Mr. Brown held the post of mathematical and drawing master to the cathedral school (one of the Henry VIII. foundations), which had the honour of educating (among other notabilities) Hy.

Philpotts, Bishop of Exeter, and Dr. Mansel, Bishop of Bristol; and his memory will be held in warm esteem by the numerous pupils who received their education under him, and by whom he was always spoken of with affectionate regard. As an artist Mr. Brown was possessed of exceptionally high talent; and although he shunned rather than courted fame, those who have seen the charming pictures from his easel must always regret that he did not enrol himself under the banner of either the Old or New Water Colour Societies, and exhibit to the Metropolis some of those works which would compare not unfavourably with the productions of the foremost painters of the day. To the stewards of the Festival Mr. Brown's loss is simply irreparable, his many years experience having made him facile princeps the first of secretaries. Roger Kerrison of Norwich, Rev. Robt. Sarjeant of Worcester, J. H. Brown of Gloucester —all, alas! no more. What ghostly memories these Festivals now have. D. H.

OCCASIONAL NOTE.

One of the most charmingly chatty things Leigh Hunt ever wrote was his "Earth upon Heaven," in which he imagined himself following out his earthly occupations in the upper world, living with all the good fellows of past ages; reading new plays of Shakespere and new novels of Scott; eating sugar that was not sanded, and drinking milk from celestial cows in the milky-way. It is to be hoped the earthly concert nuisances will be abated there also, and that we may hope to hear the Malibrans, and the Linds, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Bach, and Gluck in new and divine symphonies and songs (think of that!), without being annoyed by a garrulous angel behind us commenting on the cut of this angel's wings, the colour of that angel's feathers, and the awkward manner in which some other angel flies to her seat, and the dreadfully stupid way in which young Highfliers sat down upon Blanche's wings. It would be horrible to think of an eternity of music with an eternity of nuisance.—Peregrine Pickle.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Signor Caravoglia gave his concert in the Reading Room of the Langham Hotel. The large and fashionable audience who attended showed the estimation in which the accomplished barytone is held by his patrons, the "upper ten," whose carriages, by the way, extended the entire length of Portland Place. Signor Caravoglia had an excellent programme, the interpretation of which was entrusted to Mdlle. Nita Gaetano, Madame Florence Lancia, Les Demoiselles Badia, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Mdlle. Bini, Mdme. Demeric-Lablache, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, Mr. Lewis Thomas, Signor Rizzelli, and Signor Gardoni, as vocalists. Signor Tito Mattei was the pianist, and Mr. John Cheshire the harpist. Signor Caravoglia was in capital voice, and gave his solo arias with so much effect that the audience rewarded him with genuine applause, and called upon him to repeat a Romanza by Signor Odoardo Barri, entitled "Di Perché," and recalled him after Signor Badia's "Tu non ritorni." The accomplished barytone also joined Mdlle. Gaetano and Mr. Cobham in Signor Gordigiani's Terzetto, "Vieni al mar," Mdlle. Lancia in the duet, "Dunque io son," Signor Rizzelli in Masini's "Malattieri," and Madame Lancia, Miss Griffiths, and Signor Rizzelli in the popular quartet from Rigoletto. A Ballata, composed and sung by Signor Rizzelli, entitled "Brunetta," deserves especial notice for its excellence as a composition and for the way it was sung by its accomplished author. Mr. Cobham was in capital voice, and sang "Dalla sua pace" in his very best manner, receiving well-merited applause, and Mr. Lewis Thomas gave with great spirit "The Yeoman's Wedding." The ladies, though mentioned last, were not least in the estimation of the audience, and came off with "flying colours," Madame Lancia being greatly admired in the cavatina, "Una voce poco fa;" Mdme. Lablache in "J'ai perdu mon Euridice;" Les Demoiselles Badia in a couple of duets, and Miss Griffiths in "Quando a te liete" (Faust). Mdlle. Antoinette Badia also pleased by the manner in which she sang, with Signor Gardoni, a duet by Verdi, and Mdlle. Limia was deservedly applauded after Mr. Ganz's song, "Miss Camelia," in which she had the advantage of being accompanied by the composer. We cannot conclude without mentioning the charming way Signor Gardoni sang M. Gounod's chansonette, "La Fauvette" (which he was compelled to repeat), and how well Signor Tito Mattei played some solos of his own composition.

Messrs. Charles and Arthur Le Jeune, assisted by their father, Mr. C. W. Le Jeune, gave an evening concert at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Tuesday, which was very fully attended. The programme included some original and interesting compositions for the organ and pianoforte. The concert opened with a solo for the organ (a fantasia in E flat), composed and performed by Mr. Arthur Le Jeune, which pleased very much; as did also a characteristic march on the organ, by his brother, Mr. Charles Le Jeune, a composition of merit. He also performed Thalberg's Fantasia, on the pianoforte, from La Sonnambula, and a solo of his own, "Gentle Memories," which was much and deservedly applauded. Mr. Arthur Le Jeune displayed his talent as a pianist in Thalberg's Variations on L'Elisir d'Amore, and a pretty solo of his own, "Rêve de bonheur." A specialty in the programme was their "orchestral combination," a charming musical effect, combining the capabilities of each of the key-board instruments, realizing variety of tone, sustained and expressive melody, with elaborate and delicate accompaniment. The "combination" is an harmonium and two lesser instruments of the same nature, and though not intended to imitate an orchestra, yet it reminds one of its effects. In the overtures to William Tell and Zanetta, in the variations on "Home, Sweet Home," and a Fantasia by the elder Mr. Le Jeune, the effect was particularly good and pleasing. All the pieces were received with applause. Miss Enriquez, in Sir M. Costa's Air from Naaman, sang most artistically. Mdlle. Nita Gaetano and Mr. Edward Lloyd contributed some of the modern concert-room songs of the day with more or less applause. Mr. Wm. Ganz presided most efficiently as the accompanist.

The concerts of the London Glee and Madrigal Union are always looked forward to every season with much interest by the admirers of a class of music so thoroughly national and so thoroughly good that England may well be proud of the musicians whose names are associated with it. English glees and madrigals have never been surpassed, and musical Germany and "the land of song" cannot vie with us in this department of composition. It is only natural to expect that the country which gave birth to the great madrigal writers should also produce the best executants of their delightful compositions. Still, until Mr. Land and his coadjutors, Messrs. Baxter, Coates, and Lawler, formed themselves into a Glee and Madrigal Union, the traditional style of singing our national music was being crowded out of practice by innovations and the fashion of making every appeal to the public a personal display of ability. Mr. Land has happily succeeded in inducing a small number of good artistes to combine their talents and work together for the noble object of doing justice to English art, and the result is that a taste for glees and madrigals has been revived, and real good part-singing can now be heard throughout the London season. St. George's Hall was on the occasion under notice, well filled by Mr. Land's supporters, and the beautiful singing of Miss Jane Wells, Messrs. Coates, Baxter, Lawler, and Land, was heard to advantage in Webbe's fine glees, "Thy voice, O harmony,;" in Morley's madrigal, "Now is the month of May," and in other less time-honoured examples of the English school. Great applause followed the performance of each piece in the programme, and Morley's madrigal was encored.—Morning Advertiser.

Mrs. John Macfarren, who, during the past winter, has given many concerts and pianoforte recitals in different parts of the country with considerable success, invited her patrons to the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Friday morning, May 9, and the result was a crowded and brilliant audience. The accomplished pianist was in capital play, and her finished performance of the "Moonlight Sonata" created quite an enthusiasm, with a unanimous recall to the orchestra. She played an exquisite Rondo in A flat, by Dussek; Mozart's Sonata in A, for piano and violin (associated with Mr. Carrodus); and Chopin's Polonaise for piano and violoncello (with Herr Daubert); in each and all of which she was cordially applauded. The vocal portion of the programme was replete with interest. Mr. Santley gave with great energy a spirited new hunting song, composed expressly for him by Signor Piatti; Mdlle. Nita Gaetano sang, most charmingly, "Deh vieni," from Le Nozze di Figaro, and Gounod's "Au printemps;" Mr. Vernon Rigby gave "The Message;" Signor Caravoglia, "Madamina;" and, last, not least, Miss Banks made a great effect in the cavatina, "What is this love," from Mr. G. A. Macfarren's opera, She stoops to conquer. The concert gave unqualified satisfaction, and concluded with Haydn's trio in G, played to perfection by Mrs. John Macfarren, Mr. Carrodus, and Herr Daubert. Mr. Walter Macfarren ably officiated as conductor.

Naples.—Signor Petrella's opera, I promessi Sposi has proved something like a failure at the San Carlo.

Ancona.—Signor Verdi's Aida has proved a great hit. The principal characters are sustained by Signore Stolz, Waldmann, Signori Capponi, Pantaleoni and Maini.

PROVINCIAL.

CARDIFF.—We read as follows in the Western Mail of May 8:—

"Last night the Cardiff Drill-hall was nearly filled on the occasion of the second concert given by the Philharmonic Society. The first part of the programme consisted of 'Spring' and 'Summer,' from Haydn's Seasons; and the second part included a miscellaneous selection of choruses and solos. The choral part of the entertainment was supplied by the society itself, and the orchestra consisted of about twenty-five members, which included several professional gentlemen. The principal singers were Miss Banks (soprano), Mr. Trelawny Cobham (tenor), and Signor Foli (bass). Miss Banks was in as good voice as ever, and she achieved a genuine triumph in 'Lo, here the gentle lark.' Mr. Trelawny Cobham is a most useful tenor. Nothing could have been more simply effective and appropriate than his singing of the solos in the Seasons. But the grand feature of the evening was, undoubtedly, the singing of Signor Foli. It is needless to speak of a gentleman, whose fame as a great operatic basso is European, as a Cardiff favourite, but his reception, and the tumultuous applause which greeted all his efforts last night, sufficiently proved the latter fact—whatever it may be worth. The audience would fain have encored everything he sang, and a tumultuous expression of enthusiasm, which interrupted the further proceedings until it was gratified, compelled him to repeat 'The Mariner,' a stirring ballad by Diehl. The orchestra rendered most effective assistance, not only in their accompaniments, but by their really charming performance of Weber's overture to Oberon. Altogether, the public of Cardiff owe a deep debt of gratitude to the society, and to its indefatigable president (Mr. J. S. Corbett), for the good work they are successfully performing in cultivating a taste in the locality for choral music of the highest class, executed in a most creditable and finished manner."

YARMOUTH.—A grand concert has been given at the Regent Hall, but the attendance was not so good as it ought to have been considering the artists who had been engaged. The concert was a treat to those who did attend, the singing of Madame Thaddeus Wells and the playing of Mr. Nicholson, the celebrated flautist, being exceedingly beautiful. Mr. Orlando Christian pleased the audience much with the vocal pieces allotted to him.

STAMFORD.—A concert has been given at the Agricultural Hall, Oakham, by Mr. Nicholson, of Leicester; the vocalists being Madame Thaddeus Wells and Mr. Orlando Christian, and the instrumentalists Mr. Henry Nicholson and Madame Wells. The singing of Madame Wells was much admired, especially in "Lo! here the gentle lark," which was loudly encored. The entertainment appeared to give great satisfaction.

SCARBOROUGH.—The Express of May 3rd has the following remarks on the Scarborough Amateur Vocal and Instrumental Society:—

"On Tuesday evening last an invitation concert was given by this society in the Assembly Room, at the Prince of Wales Hotel. A large audience was present. We must remind our readers that the society was only established rather more than two years ago, and that the office of conductor is undertaken by Dr. Sloman entirely as a labour of love, from a wish to promote a taste for good music amongst the inhabitants of Scarborough, and for the South Cliff especially. The choir, with the instrumentalists, numbered about fifty; the first part of the programme, consisting of Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and the second, was made up of appropriate songs, part-songs, trios, &c.; the whole were rendered in a very admirable manner by the various ladies and gentlemen, and appeared to meet with the entire approbation of the large company assembled."

STROUD.—A performance of Handel's Samson was given at the Subscription Rooms on the 7th inst., under the auspices of the Stroud Choral Society, and did great credit to all concerned. The artists engaged were Mdlle. Pauline Rita, Miss Taylor, Mr. Wilford Morgan, and Mr. Brandon. Mr. Wilford Morgan in all he sang gave immense satisfaction. The air, "Total eclipse," was finely sung, as well as "Why does the God of Israel," and warm applause followed both. His rendering of "My genial spirits droop" is specially worthy of remark, Mr. Morgan entering fully into the spirit of the composition. The duets, "Traitor to love," and "Go, baffled coward," were also given with more than ordinary effect, and the latter was unanimously encored and repeated. The recitative, "Be of good courage," and the air, "Thus when the sun" were splendidly given, and bought down enthusiastic applause and a hearty encore. Mr. Brandon, the bass, who not only sang the part of Harapha exceedingly well, but acted as conductor of the entire performance, had a good reception. The singing of Mdlle. Pauline Rita and Miss Taylor was everything that could be desired; and Mdlle. Rita's fine delivery of "Let the bright seraphim" obtained for her a hearty encore. The band and chorus were numerous and efficient, and got through their work very creditably.

DOUGLAS.—Respecting a concert given here by Miss Wood, a resident professor, the Isle of Man Times said:—

"The professional vocalist engaged was Mdme. Billinie Porter, who on her first appearance here last summer won a reputation which her second visit has materially increased. Her voice is a pure soprano of great beauty, and in the use of it she shows a very careful instruction, and pure taste, never sacrificing a composer's work for mere display. Her rendering of Macfarren's "Beautiful May," in the first part of the programme, was charming, and well worthy of all the applause it elicited; but her finest effort, in the opinion of the musical portion of the audience, was in A Day Dream, a very lovely composition by Blumenthal. The song was given with intense feeling."

NORWICH.—In a long notice of a recent successful performance of Samson, the Norwich Mercury said:—

"The bass music—the parts of Manoah and Harapha—was taken by Mr. Greaves, who was announced as a pupil of Mr. H. Deacon. This gentleman promises to be one of the best bass singers that we have heard. His voice is throughout full and rich, is of good compass, and is well in hand. In addition to this, Mr. Greaves sang carefully just what Handel wrote, taking no liberties, not even in the recitatives. At the same time, there was a self-command apparent which showed that he knew well what he was about. In the duet with Mr. Minns he was very good, but won the most hearty and well-deserved applause for his singing of that magnificent air, 'Honour and arms.' 'How willing my paternal love,' was a fine example of tender expression, and 'Presuming slave,' of hearty scorn. Mr. Greaves' first appearance in Norwich will, we trust, not be the last, for he has thus early in life proved himself worthy to take a part in the efficient rendering of the works of the great masters. Mr. Deacon, if he was present, must have been highly gratified at the success of his pupil; while the Festival Committee must be even more pleased that they have brough out a young man who, if he will, can make a good name for himself among English artists."

SHAKESPERE'S DRAMAS AND MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to point out an omission in reference to the above interesting and cleverly-written statistical report. There was also an opera on The Tempest, by the late Sigismund Thalberg, which was performed at Her Majesty's Opera, about the year 1845—46, if I remember rightly. In reference to incidental music to Macbeth, there is an overture published for the full orchestra in London, which, together with the Entr'acte, Melodrama, &c., is still played at the Court theatre in Wiesbaden whenever the play is performed—the composition of your truly obedient servant,

CHARLES OBERTHUR.

THE SONG OF THE SOPRANO.

(From the New York Weekly Review.)

I.
I'm a thousand dollar soprano!
That's my lowest possible rate.
Who'll have me? High church or low,
Speak quick or you'll be too late.

II.
An up-town church I prefer,
With a fashionable congregation,
But, indeed, I will not demur
At aught that befits my station.

III.
Yet it's natural that my choice
Is to be on an Avenue;
Fifth or Madison suits my voice,
I assure you it's strictly true.

IV.
A tenor I'd recommend;
He sings opera duets with me.
A basso too I can send
Who will take a low salary.

V.
I must have all the solos, of course,
Must select the contralto too;
For if she had too much force
Of voice, she will never do.

VI.
And I'd also prefer to select
The organist—one who'd owe
To me his place. He'd expect
To play as I told him to.

VII.
At the services I must sing
Music to make one dance,
Lloyd, Lambilotte, that sort of thing;
I detest those stupid old chants.

VIII.
Each Te Deum must contain
Two solos for me to do,
Or else I must sing my own
And the tenor solo too.

IX.
For the sermon I cannot wait,
Unless in the offertory
Another solo be mine,
To sing to my praise and glory.

X.
Of course, I cannot attend
The church on a rainy day;
Nor can I a substitute send
In the summer when I'm away.

XI.
When to Europe I want to go,
The vestry, if in its senses,
Must agree that I may do so,
And promptly defray my expenses.

XII.
I'm a thousand dollar soprano!
Engage me without further trouble;
For if you delay much longer

MUSIC AT THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

(From "The Times," May 8.)

Mr. Joseph Barnby, to whose public exertions in various ways our musical amateurs are already so much indebted, is now trying an experiment which we cannot but think will bring good fruits. We do not here refer to the oratorio performances, given by the Albert Hall Choral Society, under his able direction, but to the concerts, now of daily occurrence, at which for the first time is allotted a real and substantial place to music in the International Exhibition, where other arts have hitherto obtained conspicuous recognition. Painting, sculpture, and architecture possess an advantage of which music cannot boast. Masterpieces in any of these arts may be seen and judged, day after day, without the intervention of a medium; whereas music absolutely requires a medium, in the shape of a performer or a body of performers, to give audible utterance to the thoughts of the composer. A printed score of a symphony, quartet, or overture is of little avail, inasmuch as, however ready at hand, there is hardly one person out of a thousand who can read it. Mr. Barnby's idea, therefore, of making music as accessible to those who attend the Exhibition as other arts is worthy of all commendation. Day after day he provides a concert of vocal and instrumental music, of about an hour and a half in duration, the programme consisting exclusively of selections from the works of acknowledged masters, ancient and modern. He has an orchestra of some 50 or 60 strong, with Mr. Deichmann at the head of the violins, and Mr. Pettit at the head of the violoncellos, conducted, it is scarcely requisite to add, by Mr. Barnby himself. An orchestral symphony, or concerto, two overtures, and some vocal pieces are to be heard on every occasion. A fair idea of the character of the performances may be gathered from the works already presented. Among other things there have been three of Beethoven's symphonies in C, C minor, and F (No. 8); Haydn's Symphony in G (The Surprise); Schumann's in E flat; Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's in E minor (The Spring); and Mendelssohn's Scotch and Reformation Symphonies. Among the overtures we have had the Zauberflöte and Clemenza di Tito of Mozart; Wagner's Fliegende Holländer; Mehul's Chasse du Jeune Henri; Julius Rietz's Lustspiel; Weber's Oberon; M. Gounod's Médecin Malgrè lui; Rossini's Guillaume Tell; Beethoven's Egmont; and the Overture composed by the late Auber expressly for the Exhibition of 1862. The miscellaneous pieces have included the "Dance of Reapers," from Mr. Arthur Sullivan's music to the Tempest; Mendelssohn's Cornelius March; a ballet piece from Schubert's Rosamunde; Signor Arditi's pot-pourri from the Lohengrin of Wagner; M. Gounod's Saltarello and Processional March from the Reine de Saba; Handel's Organ Concerto in G minor (organist, Mr. Best); and a choice series of vocal pieces contributed by Misses Katherine Poyntz, Dones, D'Almaine, and Walton, Mdlle. Gips, Mr. Thurley Beale, &c.

Thus far nothing could be better; but we learn from the prospectus that still more is intended, and that in another way. Great works, already recognized, are not to be the exclusive attraction for those inclined to visit the music room during the period of the Exhibition, which, we need hardly say, extends to the last week in October. Till this time the daily concerts will be uninterrupted, thus giving Mr. Barnby an opportunity of stimulating musical culture and progress, of which he pledges himself to take advantage in the most practical way. He not only intends to bring forward the works of young composers, English, or residents in England, but to encourage young performers, vocal and instrumental, by enabling them to exhibit their talents in public, and thus helping them to a career the issue of which must of course depend on their ability and perseverance. Ordinary concert givers cannot safely run the risk of speculating with untried skill, and hence the opportunity of taking his first step is that which any young artist finds the most difficult to obtain. Mr. Barnby's scheme, however, being altogether exceptional in its conditions, enables him to supply a long felt want, and there is good reason to anticipate the happiest results from its working. It remains to be seen how far the public are disposed to support an undertaking which not only reflects high credit upon its promoters, but is a substantial addition to the musical resources of the metropolis. That the daily performances at the Royal Albert Hall are of themselves interesting and worthy all encouragement is unquestionable. The orchestra is excellent in all departments, and the conductor thoroughly up to his work. The educational value of the concerts is considerably enhanced by the interesting and instructive notes to each programme from the pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett. Mr. Barnby's last oratorio concert for the season was given on Wednesday evening week, when Handel's too-long neglected Belshazzar was performed.

SHALL ORGAN GRINDERS BE PUT TO DEATH?

"Semper ego auditor tantum? Nunquam me reponam?"—Juv. i. 2.

The origin of the organ grinders justifies their extinction, as does also the doom with which they are threatened. This race is derived from Jubal, the sixth in descent from Cain, who was "the father of all them that handle the harp and organ" (here note the accuracy of description of the word "handle"). The seed of Cain, who destroyed his own brother, may with justice be destroyed in turn.

Later in history a trace of the race is detected in the patriarch's pathetic outcry against the "instruments of cruelty" in his sons' tents. In Egypt, and in Pharaoh's time, they seem to have been swept away. Egypt was a wisely governed country. Had they existed, that prince might have been spared nine of the plagues, since an hour's infliction of this one must have softened the rock of his hard heart and forced him to send the tribes trooping forth to the desert with their minstrels at the head, playing the rogue's march of the period. In that age, surely, organ grinding was one of the lost arts. There is hope, then, that it may again become so strengthened by the cheerful prediction, that in the latter days "the sound of the grinders shall wax low." Organ grinders are a nuisance. It is therefore lawful to kill them. [Vide Judge Shaw's decision ad fin.]

Public policy requires their extinction. The race consists chiefly of Italian refugees, banished for turbulence from their own country, making a trade of revolutions here, and revenging themselves by the murder of music, for their inability to destroy order. It is, therefore, courteous and polite in us, as a nation, to kill them.

Humanity pleads for their abolition. They are a wretched people, born out of time, who rear a wretched progeny. It is, then, generous, and merciful to themselves to kill them.

Political economy demands that they should perish. They are wholly useless, never doing a hand's turn of work, though many a hand's turn of play. It is, therefore, prudent for society to kill them.

Upon this foundation of reasoning may be built a strong tower of authorities in favour of their extirpation. That rigid and moral generation, the Puritans, regarded the organ as the devil's box of pipes even when used for sacred services. How much more would they have been moved with holy zeal for the destruction of his wandering emissaries who bear the abomination from door to door!

Shakespeare makes the practical genius of Othello speak with contempt of hearing "a brazen can stick turned," in evident allusion to grinding organs.

It is true that Lord Bacon composed a work known to scholars as the "Novum Organum," or "New Organ." But this only proves the hatred of that great and wise man for old organs.

The French style them "orgues de barbarie," or barbarian organs. To banish them and their barbarian supporters is one of the first duties of a civilised people.

Having settled the lawfulness, humanity, and prudence, of ridding the world of organ-grinders, it should be considered how this may best be done.

Not, perhaps, by individual efforts. The remembrance of suffering might darken an act of justice in revenge. Nor would it suffice merely for the State to put a stop to organs, seeing that the addition of a stop to those they have already would but increase their power of mischief. There are wiser plans, too, than that of execution on the scaffold, which might create a morbid sympathy. For example, make them the instruments of their own destruction, by setting them in some secluded place, to play each other to death. Or they might simply be exiled to Tunis.

The public ear is large and patient; the need of this reform once forced into it, a proper plan will not be wanting. Then will discord be driven from the land, and peace and quietness return; while the grinding organ shall decorate museums, and be wondered at by our descendants as the last and most cruel of the instruments of torture that disgraced an age calling itself refined.—Boston Transcript.

MARSEILLES.—A new opera, Pétrarque, by M. Delprar, has been successfully produced. The composer was recalled, and presented by his admirers with a gold crown. They had evidently made up their minds beforehand that the opera was to be a triumph.

A LIFE OF BACH.

(From the "Globe.")

Sir Julius Benedict, who has written a short preface to Miss Kay-Shuttleworth's volume, makes a comparison between the fortunes of the great contemporaries, Bach and Handel—between the immediate renown of the latter and the life-long obscurity of the former, both leading to an equal crown of glory at the end of a hundred and fifty years. The comparison is obvious, but suggestive. To impugn the greatness of Handel would be flagrantly absurd, even in the face of the fact that by far the greater number of his works, most of which were elaborately adapted to the taste of his true patron, the public of his own time, are now practically ignored. But in the whole history of music the name of John Sebastian Bach stands in one grand respect above every other name. Its owner was not only the patriarch of modern music in its very highest form, but was the very type and model of the true musician, past, present, and to come. Those who listened to the Matthæus Passion Music, so triumphantly rendered a few weeks ago in its proper season, and thought of its history, must have indulged in many reflections on the revenges of time. That immortal work was once heard in public during its composer's life, on Good Friday, 1729, and was then utterly forgotten till Mendelssohn once more gave it to the world at the end of exactly a hundred years. After nearly half a century more it is devoutly listened to by thousands of novelty-hating Englishmen, who, a few years ago, only thought vaguely of Bach as a manufacturer of fugues and other scientific abominations in popular ears. It may be urged that musical appreciation and knowledge have improved. That only shows how far the composer stood in advance of his own time, if it has taken the world a century and a half to overtake one of his footsteps.

The abridgment of his biography, made from the work of Herr Bitter, is in form and style rather a collection of dry bones, but it is not the less useful for merely bringing the dates and facts of an uneventful life as closely together as possible. The history of Bach is the chronology of his work, and little more. But the most meagre sketch, if made as simply and faithfully as this, cannot fail to give a noble picture of the grand old master who knew no life but patient art, who never toiled for fame or gain, to whom neglect was nothing, and success welcome only so far as it was due. The musical temperament is generally regarded as essentially passionate; the man who had it most perfectly was sublimely calm and self-contained. As is well-known, music was in Bach's very blood; he was of a whole race, or rather caste, of musicians drawing its family tendencies from Veit Bach, the Presburg baker, who used to take his flute with him to the mill and play while his corn was being ground. One of his sons and six of his grandsons became musicians, and their descendants for many generations filled the organ-lofts of Germany to such an extent that in one place an organist was always called a "Bach," whether he really bore that name or no. John Sebastian had not a cousin or near ancestor who was not a musician. Curiously enough, the same story is told of him that is related of Handel—that his earliest studies were made by stealth. The church organists of those days were a jealous generation, and John Sebastian's brother, who brought him up, seems to have wished to keep to himself the inner mysteries of the craft, a course never imitated by his great pupil, who was ever as ready to teach as he was eager to learn. It was the result of copying music secretly by moonlight that in later life cost him the use of his eyes. There is no doubt that without some amount of royal and princely favour his employers, the Lutheran church authorities, would have let him starve. Not even music-loving Leipzig ever understood its brightest ornament, and his post there was eagerly filled up in anticipation of his death, so that the Thomas Church might look forward to have a "singing master" instead of a composer. Not a stone was placed over his grave, nor was any notice of his loss taken by any Leipzig newspaper. Frederick the Great, however, a discriminating, though not generous, art patron, had treated him with barren honour, and had given him such prestige, as lay in the exclamation, "Only one Bach—only one Bach!" when made by a king. But the honour, though empty, was sound. There was only one Bach, and there is only one Bach still.

Miss Kay-Shuttleworth's book is full of facts, and therefore of interest, and gives a full and useful catalogue of all the master's works by way of appendix. It is not a book of criticism, but it amply proves, if any proof were needed, the true artistic greatness of the "one Bach" who lived more than a century before his age.

THE EARLY FRENCH ORCHESTRA.

Lully, in creating the Opera, had found in France no suitable elements for the proper foundation of this species of performance; he was obliged to make use of the very inconsiderable resources to be found among the professional musicians, scattered as they were with no centre of union and no acquaintance with concerted music. Later he trained up pupils and succeeded in bringing together an orchestra, whose arrangement seems singular enough to us, accustomed as we are to a wealth of instrumentation far removed from the simplicity of those primitive germs. The orchestra of Lully's opera was arranged in the following manner: the stringed instruments were divided into five parts, comprising first violins, first viols, viols, bass and double bass viols. Violoncellos were not introduced until later, and the modern double bass was not admitted into France until 1709, long after the death of Lully. It was played for the first time by one Monclair, a very clever composer, in Jephté, an opera of his own composition. The effect of the instrument was found to be excellent, and Monclair was engaged at the Opera as contrabassist. At first he was expected to play only once a week, on Saturday, the great day for the Opera, and that of the best performances. It was not long before the contra-bass was demanded every day; then a single one was not enough, one was added, afterwards two, then three, then four.

To return to Lully's orchestra, we must give a list of the wind instruments. These were numerous, but were divided quite differently from those of our day. First there were the flutes, not the German flute, the only one now in use, but the beaked flute (of which the flageolet remains to us), and of which the smallest inconvenience was its being almost constantly out of tune. The flutes formed one complete family; there were treble, tenor, and bass flutes. It was the same with the oboes, the bass of which is the bassoon. For brass instruments, there were trumpets with stops and hunting horns; and for instruments of percussion they had kettle-drums and tambourines for dance music. They had also a harpsichord for accompanying the recitatives. But what they were entirely ignorant of was the art of blending these different instruments together. When the composer desired a forte, he wrote the word tous (all), and then the copyist doubled the parts for the stringed instruments by parts for wind instruments of corresponding register. In certain passages, rarely except in ritornellos, the composer wrote flutes or oboes, and these instruments played alone, which was the easier for them as their system was complete. The bassoons played almost always with the bass and double-bass viols, which, mounted with many strings, had very little sonority. But the idea of taking advantage of the difference in the tone of their instruments, and of giving them particular parts for the purpose of blending them together, had not occurred to them. However, Lully's orchestra excited the admiration of his contemporaries, and one of his panegyrists lauds him for having introduced every known instrument, even, he adds, the tinker's whistle. We have looked over all of Lully's scores without finding any indication of these instruments, which are entirely unknown to us.

When Rameau gave his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie (1733), instrumentation had made great progress; the German flute had replaced the beaked flute; the oboes had been perfected; they were played with finer reeds and had gained greatly in softness and sweetness. Rameau, who was fertile in invention, made great innovations in the arrangement of parts; he concerted wind with stringed instruments, and produced surprising effects by means of these combinations. The clarinet, invented in 1690, was not used in France until 1745, and then by Rameau in his opera Le Temple de la Gloire; but it made part of the orchestra only occasionally, and in the overture, as a rare and curious instrument. The clarinet had not yet obtained the freedom of the orchestra. As late as 1780 the Comédie-Italienne possessed none. Grétry, however, had made use of it in Zémire et Azor, but only in the minor trio, and as an unusual instrument which must produce a magical effect. Besides, the clarinet, at the time it was introduced into France, was not the same instrument with sweet, melancholy tones which we now hear; on the contrary, it was harsh and piercing. The name it received proves this: clarinetto is the diminutive of clarino, clarion, trumpet; in fact, the first composers who made use of it employed it only to double the octave for the flourishes of horns and trumpets, and this use was continued even after the instrument was, as it were, transformed. Haydn and Mozart rarely fail to double their appels of horns and trumpets with the clarinet. The French horn appeared about this time, and caused the hunting-horn to be proscribed in the orchestra. Its virtuosos could practise upon it only in the dog-kennel and the ale-house.

"NATURE'S SWEET RESTORER."

(From the New York "Weekly Review.")

DEAR REVIEW,—Does slumber conduce to the appreciation of orchestral music? I ask this pertinent question because at every concert I go to I am sure to meet a well-known critic—one who is a recognized authority in artistic matters, and who writes the best musical articles in the city—sitting at all the great concerts of the day in a state of uncomfortable slumber. His eyes close, his head falls back, his mouth opens, he is fast asleep as a door-nail—or as Endymion when Diana kissed him by the light of the crescent moon. All men are indignant when charged with sleeping in public. So it is with the somnolent critic. He will deny in angry terms the charge that he ever gets sleepy. He asserts that he closes his eyes merely to devote his mind more exclusively to the music. Why, then, should he nearly dislocate his neck by sudden starts, or fall over on his neighbour's shoulder? There is no doubt of the fact that the man calmly and deliberately goes to sleep. Yet, at the end of the symphony or concerto, he will wake up and applaud vigorously, and the next number of his paper will contain a well-written article on the performance.

At nearly every concert where the better class of music is performed you may see somebody asleep. The oratorio, the Thomas Symphony concerts, the Rubinstein concerts, all are attended with great regularity by faithful slumberers. At a private reception the other night, where the room was small, the light overpowering, and the atmosphere close and warm, several of the guests succumbed, despite the rules of etiquette. Yet they all declared that the music was delightful—when it was over. The fact is that music—especially instrumental music—does have a somnolent effect. The performer, kept awake by his active participation in it, does not comprehend the sufferings of his listeners, and is apt to attribute to stupidity what is generally the result of heat and foul air. Ventilation is the great secret. Nobody sleeps at an open air concert. Nobody goes to sleep when Theodore Thomas's orchestra plays at the Central Park Garden.

There is something, after all, very delightful in going to sleep at a concert. But for the sense of guilt, which the sleeper feels at first, it would be perfect bliss. How easily the eyes close! How gently the head falls back! How pleasantly the wandering thoughts compose themselves into oblivion! How charmingly the droning of the violins soothes and calms the senses! But then there is the awful shame of waking up! There is the fall backward or forward, the dazed opening of the eyes, the furtive glance cast about to see if you are observed, the spasmodic burst of applause to show that you have after all enjoyed "that lovely passage" exceedingly, the false but flattering unction that 'those giggling girls are giggling not at you, but at somebody else. Then there are five minutes of keen critical attention, a falling off in interest, a closing of eyes, a blissful blank, and you are awakened to a sound of applause, and vacantly stare at the conductor, bowing his thanks, and have an awful consciousness that something is wrong—that you have been asleep again!

It seems to me that the sleepy folks who go to concerts—critics and all—could enjoy the most delicious pleasure if they would form a secret society, engage an orchestra, and give a Slumber Concert. It should take place in a small, badly ventilated hall. The first piece should be an orchestral arrangement of Sullivan's "Hush thee, my baby," to be followed by Abt's "Sleep well, and sweet be thy repose." The slumber duet from Trovatore might follow. A few serenades, stating, in varied phraseology, that "she sleeps, my lady sleeps," should be the next introduced, and then Gottschalk's cradle song, "Slumber on, baby dear," will be timely. Popular music of the day might be represented by "Dreaming of thee," and "Come where my love lies dreaming," and Barnby's "Soft and low" would sweetly describe how "My little one, how my pretty one sleeps." At this delightful entertainment it would be etiquette to go to sleep. Any person wishing to keep awake should be excluded. Indeed, admission to the Club might be made through a species of Civil Service examination. Every candidate should be asked the following questions:—

1. Have you eaten a heavy dinner within the past two hours?
2. Have you ever kept awake during the whole of a long symphony by Raff?
3. Can you sleep easily in a sitting position?
4. Do you snore?
5. Which composer do you find most conducive to slumber?
6. Do you sleep well at the Philharmonic concerts?
7. Do you acknowledge that the true end of music is to make you slumber?

These and similar questions satisfactorily answered, the candidate could be admitted to all the rights and privileges of the Club. Each concert should close with Mendelssohn's chorale, "Sleepers, awake," and at the proper moment ushers should enter the room to prod the sleepers with canes and umbrellas. Arising then from a refreshing slumber, the audience would congratulate itself, and, after mutually remarking "What a delightful nap we have had," would disperse in a sweet and amiable frame of mind, recuperated and invigorated for the sterner duties of life.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—A concert of a popular character, consisting of ballads, part-songs, &c., will be given on Saturday next, the 24th inst. The solo vocalists announced are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Dones, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Mr. Sims Reeves is to sing "Tom Bowling," Frederic Clay's new song, "'Tis better not to know," and to join Madame Sherrington in the "Miserere Scene," from Il Trovatore. The choir will be composed of the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby, and are to sing, amongst other pieces, Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God." A special feature in this performance is the fact of its commencing at seven o'clock and terminating at nine, which will enable persons residing at a distance to be present at this interesting concert.

MILAN.—Signor Pacini's opera, Saffo, has been produced at the Teatro Dal Verme with Signora Vanda Miller in the principal part. The lady gave general satisfaction to the representatives of the press, and was pretty well supported. As to the general public, however, they knew very little about the matter, the high prices of admission frightening them away as effectually as a sudden loss of fortune keeps a man's friends at a respectable distance—as a boy with a clapper prevents the birds from settling on the fruit in an orchard, or the grain in a cornfield.—The Società del Quartetto applied to Signor Verdi for permission to perform the Quartet he wrote during his visit to Naples, a short time since, and Signor Verdi refused to grant it them.

CALAPOOR.—The Rajah of this Eastern principality—for particulars as to longitude, latitude, revenue, constitution, and climate consult a respectable geographer—was lately present, on his way through Cairo, at a performance of Signor Petrella's Jone. He was so delighted that he resolved, then and there, to have an Italian Opera in his own capital. Here is a chance for sopranos without an engagement and unappreciated tenors.

MUNICH.—Professor Joseph Rheinberger's comic opera, Das Thürmers Töchterlein has been produced at the Royal Operahouse. The subject is taken from local history, the action being laid here in May, 1632, when the Swedes, under Gustavus Adolphus, had entered the town. The book, written by Herr Max Stahl, though containing many lyric beauties, is weak in dramatic interest. The composer, however, has turned it to very good account. After the fourth act, and at the fall of the curtain, he was enthusiastically called for several times, while the performers were quite overwhelmed with applause during the whole evening. The principal parts were sustained by Mdlle. Stehle and Herr Vogl.

Times for Music.

DREAM ON!*

Sleep, baby, sleep! and happy dream
Of things that to thee brightest seem,
Of pleasures that thou lov'st the best,
With infant glee and childish zest.
First in my heart thou hold'st a place,
By thy young love and winning grace—
Close to my breast thy form is drawn;
Sleep, baby, sleep!—dream on, dream on!

Here in my arms thou calm dost rest,
In youthful beauty art thou drest;
Roses upon thy round cheeks blow,
And cherries on thy red lips grow.
Dream of the angels that watch keep
Around thee, while in blissful sleep
Thou'rt wrapt. Ere these sweet days are gone,
Happily slumbering—Oh! dream on!

Dream while thou canst, ere the hard strife,
Troubles, and cares, thou feel'st of life,
That manhood and advancing years
May bring to thee with bitter tears;
While up to Heav'n thy mother's prayer
Ascends for thy beloved welfare,
That nought but joy may on thee dawn,
Peacefully sleeping—still dream on!

It is reported that Mr. John Brougham has received liberal offers from the Shah of Persia to open the new theatre at Ispahan, with his "Pocahontas;" and that, in case he should go, Mr. Brougham will return via Abyssinia, playing engagements by the way. One may as well credit any report now-a-days about theatrical people, until it is authentically disputed.

A Boston lecturer, quite a connoisseur in bird-stuffing, told a droll story of himself. One day he stopped at a window where a large owl was exhibited, and remarked to a friend: "You see that there is a magnificent bird utterly ruined by unskilful stuffing. Notice the mounting. Execrable, is it not? No living owl ever roosted in that position. The eyes are fully a third larger than any owl ever had." As he thus spoke, the bird raised one foot, and solemnly winked at the critic. Moral: be careful in expressing your opinions.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, writing from Rome, says that Mr. Healey "has in his studio a fine portrait of Longfellow and his daughter Edith. The poet is seated, and turning over the leaves of a book, while his daughter leans upon his shoulder and looks over the book with him. It is one of the finest likenesses of the poet I have ever seen. The expression of the face is serious and thoughtful, and yet one can see in it something of that genial courtesy and kindness of heart which make our great poet so charming to all who know him."

This is a New Orleans "musical criticism:"—"There are strains in the opera that bud out timorously, and others again that blossom into perfect bouquets of ravishing sound—some evanescent and delicate as the odour of frail wild flowers; and others interpenetrating one's being with a passionate and lasting perfume."

During the performance at an English theatre recently, a decided and continued hiss was heard above the applause of the spectators. The more the audience laughed and applauded the louder the hissing became. The culprit was at length discovered to be a plethoric old gentleman upon whom an operation for tracheotomy had once been performed, necessitating the placing in the throat of a silver tube. The effect of the pipe, we are told, was that when the gentleman laughed a sound like hissing was produced, and the more the stout gentleman laughed the more he hissed.

In one of the Western States of America, a German Lutheran minister, who has a wonderful inventive and constructive genius, has for years devoted his leisure time to inventing some kind of musical instrument so simple that it will not require long practice and skilled fingers to produce the best music. He has now perfected a contrivance which can be attached to an organ or other musical instrument, and by touching the keys in regular order, commencing at the left-hand side, any tune for which it is set will be played. The attachment is as yet limited to forty tunes, but a great many more can be very easily attached.

From the moment a person, of either sex, becomes in any degree proficient in music, vocal or instrumental, he and she become possessed, seemingly, of the opinion that to them belongs all the talent in the community, and the remainder of their existence must be devoted to a watchful care, lest some upstart pretender to musical honours shall assail their position and bring reproach upon them by contact of rivalry. To ward off so dire a calamity all available means are laudable and praiseworthy, and vituperation, depreciation, concealed slander and personal insinuations, cloaked by friendly admiration, appreciative adulation, and sometimes warm friendship, are unsparingly used.

Galignani's Messenger of May 7 contained the following:—

"A most interesting organ performance was given on Monday afternoon by Mr. Best, the well-known player, on a magnificent instrument built expressly, by M. Cavaillé-Coll, 15, Avenue du Maine, for the new Music-hall at Sheffield. This organ has been erected at a cost of £5,000, and contains 64 speaking stops, inclusive of two of the 32 feet scale. The programme was varied and of great interest, and fully showed off all the resources of this splendid work of art, and Mr. Best's playing attracted all the principal artists in Paris as well as many English visitors. Another performance is to be given this (Wednesday) afternoon, at four o'clock, by M. Widor and M. Saint-Saens, when very probably many English and American visitors, who had not previously known of the first performance, will avail themselves of this new opportunity."

The fact that there was much abuse of the press in connection with the Boston Festivals; the fact that paper and ink were to cover everything, and keep a whole nation in darkness as to defects; the fact that the press represented things in overdrawn colours, thereby aiming to make the festival a success, is a dark spot on Boston's unblemished musical history. And whom has she to thank for all this? We are glad to see Cincinnati avoid the rocks on which the Boston festivals foundered. It is the intention of Cincinnatians to continue these festivals year after year, if this one will prove a success. But why give up a good work if the beginning of it may not be a complete success? We would then have no Atlantic cable. No; let us rather say that if this fails, we'll try again and do better, until the Cincinnati Festivals shall become musical events of the first artistic magnitude. But why talk of failure with a man like Thomas at the head? Success to the Festival!—Musical World. (American.)

A wealthy and celebrated inventor of Baltimore is going to put on the top of his house a musical instrument to be driven by steam, and sonorous enough to make itself heard by the whole city. It is doubtful if this spirited device will increase the attractiveness of Baltimore as a residence. The head-organ performers usually supply as much outdoor music as the community require. Sometimes, indeed, this supply exceeds the demand, but the operator may be persuaded to retire by a small gratuity. Not so easily could the calliope be made to subside. The thing would roar onward obedient only to the engineer, and flood the city with music, whether it wanted it or not. A better way would be to devise some system by which each householder could turn on the music as he turns on the gas or the water. But this plan of deafening the entire city with it in season and out of season, as a few years ago certain diabolical steamboat owners deafened both shores of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers with scream-driven symphonies and fugues is one against which the Baltimoreans will doubtless protest most vigorously.

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

ANOTHER MASTERPIECE, BUT NOT FOR US.*

An occasion, unfortunately too rare, now presents itself to the friends of science and to artists, of enjoying a close view of one of those mechanical and acoustic masterpieces called a grand organ, of exceptional proportions, and of hearing its newly created sonorous powers inaugurated by a succession of the most celebrated organists in Europe. The house of Cavaillé-Coll has just completed the construction of one of the immense instruments called organs of thirty-two feet, of which there are only three or four in France. For the next fortnight amateurs will flock to the spacious workshops in the Avenue du Maine, to admire the colossal structure before it leaves, and to listen to a series of organ concerts which, for some time, will console us for the close of what is called in Paris the musical season.

Yesterday, May 6th, it was the most celebrated organist in England, Mr. W. T. Best, who, for more than two hours, kept under the spell of his admirable talent a numerous audience, delighted at hearing interpreted à l'Anglaise the compositions, so popular on the other side the Channel, of Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn. To-morrow it will be our most celebrated Parisian organists, Camille Saint-Saëns, of the Madeleine; C. M. Widor, of Saint Sulpice, Al. Guilmant, of La Trinité, and others. It is stated that we may very shortly expect the arrival of M. Lemmens, the illustrious organ professor of Brussels.

The case is 13 metres† broad, and 6 deep; when set up it will be 17 metres high. There are four manual keyboards of 61 notes, from C to C, and a pedal board of 30 notes. There are 74 registers, 10 being for the mixtures, and there are, also, 21 combination pedals. Of these 64 complete stops, 2 sound the thirty-two feet open; 14, the sixteen feet; and 20, the eight feet.

Eight grand sound-boards, arranged in three rows, support the 4052 pipes, which six blowers may, if requisite, supply with wind. There is not a pipe, not a part of the mechanism, which cannot be readily reached without deranging anything. Large and convenient passages enable the visitor to get without difficulty at all parts of the instrument. Two winding staircases, as easy and practicable as those in our houses, are fixed inside, and communicate with every storey. Ladies may be escorted through all the interior mechanism, whereas, in the case of other organs, the interior cannot be viewed without gymnastic efforts of a laborious and frequently dangerous character.

Each key-board has, to overcome any exertion in drawing it out, a separate pneumatic lever, which gives to each one, and to all together, the softness of a piano key-board. The registers are drawn out, as at Saint-Sulpice and Notre-Dame, Paris, by pneumatic motors, which render them as easy to be moved as those of the smallest harmonium. Combination registers enable the performer to combine beforehand the stops he wishes to speak, and to render them available, when wanted, by a mere touch of the finger.

In three of the four manual key-boards, the expressive stops are worked by independent pedals, which allow the sound to be graduated from extreme softness to the most deafening force. The pedals of the stops of the solo key-board are managed in the usual way, but those of the choir organ, and of the swell, are in the form of a cuckoo turning upon pivots, and are worked by the player's placing on them his two feet, and pressing either with his toes or with his heels, to graduate relatively the opening of the expressive blades; these, by the way, retain the position given them, when the feet leave and return to the pedal key-board. In addition to a grand choir with 10 reed stops, already a pretty formidable affair, three stops with full pressure, ranged en chamade, that is to say, horizontally, half way up the organ and behind the speaking front, may, at any given moment, add to the whole a power hitherto unknown, and under the impression thus produced we may, in truth, form an idea of the terrible summons of the trumpets on the Last Day.

The mass of the flue-pipes representing 35 stops, more than half the organ, is worthy the power of the reed stops; as for the other stops, the vox cœlestis, the vox humana, the hautboys, musette, etc., we know the ideal perfection displayed by the firm of Cavaillé in harmonising them; in this instrument, as in that of every fresh one the firm sends out, we can simply repeat that it has surpassed itself. But who are the happy beings destined to possess and listen to such a masterpiece? What establishment is there rich enough to give the builder carte-blanche, merely enjoining him to produce something better than has ever been produced before? It is not, alas! a church! The time has come when churches can no longer go to such an expense; they must provide what is strictly necessary, before indulging in what is grandiose. They are not French ears that will hear these harmonies. France seems doomed for some time to listen to nothing but the noise of firearms and the ravings of democratic clubs. Meanwhile, she stupefies herself with the broad jokes of the minor theatres and the abominations of the Café-Concerts. It is—mark well—the cutlers of the town of Sheffield, in England, who, to rest themselves of an evening, after the noise of anvils and of files, have resolved to hear, not the cooings of comic opera but the grave and male accents of classical music. They have devoted a million to build, decorate, and furnish a splendid concert-hall for six thousand auditors and six hundred performers; they have gone to the first builder in the world and ordered of him the finest organ in England, and to prove distinctly what kind of music they love, they have had painted upon a golden background, at the top of the case, two large medallions, that on one side representing Johann Sebastian Bach, and that on the other their immortal Handel.

Yes, while at Paris—which plumes itself on being the capital of the intelligent world, the home of art, the queen of elegant civilization—the theatres have become places of immoral exhibition, regular shops with certain wares for sale, while genuine art seeks shelter in unknown corners, while Beethoven and Mendelssohn, in order to be heard by the select among the people, are obliged to beg the hospitality of a circus, and brave the odours of a stable, a purely manufacturing town, a provincial town not perhaps even mentioned in our treatises on geography, a second-class town—but a town in England—consecrates a million for the purpose of enabling its population to hear classical symphonies and oratorios. Go, now, ye illustrious frequenters of the Boulevards, who fancy yourselves the incarnation of French wit, ye proud barons of finance, ye muscadin statesmen, ye dapper editors and readers of fashionable papers, go and applaud Les Cocottes d'Or and La Timbale d'Argent. The masterpieces of the masters are not for you any more than the treasures of art; they are for those who work, for those whom work inspires with a taste for what is grand and beautiful, men, for instance, like the cutlers of Sheffield!

ALBERT DUPAIGNE.

"ANOTHER WORLD."

(From Appleton's "New York Journal.")

Regarding the new book just published, entitled Another World, in which the author seriously professes to give, "from actual experience, a matter-of-fact account of the laws, manners, and customs of a kingdom situated in one of the planets of the solar system," Punch asks the author to be good enough to gratify a pardonable curiosity, and answer the following questions respecting our fellow-planetants:—Have they a national debt? Have they any "old masters?" Are they forbidden to marry their deceased wives' sisters; or is it legal to do so in the northeast and illegal in the southwest? Do they talk about the weather, or have they any weather to talk about? Do they take a reciprocal interest in us and our proceedings; and have they telescopes of sufficient power to make out the course of the Serpentine, the summit of Primrose Hill, the top of the Duke of York's column, etc.?—Do they make mariages de convenance? Do they wear beards? Have they lawyers? Is such a thing as a job known in the upper circles? Are any of the following articles in request among them:—rouge, false hair, orders for theatres, fiery sherry, morning calls, quack medicines, high black hats, after-dinner speeches, burlesques, great exhibitions, horse-hair wigs, and turtle-soup? Do they make Latin verses? Do they learn the dead languages of extinct planets before they are taught their own? Are their railways or airways, or whatever their means of locomotion may be called, as well managed as our own? Have they street music? Have they trouble with their servants? Is the manufacture of umbrellas a flourishing branch of their trade and commerce?—Have they a lord-mayor?—Have they a Punch?

DRESDEN.—Herr Friedrich Grützmacher has had the cross of the Saxe-Ernest House-Order, first class, conferred on him by the Duke of Meiningen.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The performances of last week will not take long to describe. Auber's Masaniello was given twice. It is pleasant to hear this glorious work, the highest example of French musical genius, once again, more or less in its integrity. Masaniello is just as much the French Guillaume Tell as the composer of Masaniello is the French Rossini. The present cast of the dramatis personæ at Covent Garden has few, if any, weak points, and the general execution of the opera, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, is, on the whole, effective. Signor Nicolini looks the character of the adventurous Neapolitan well, acts it with spirit, and sings the music like one who thoroughly understands it—which, he being a Frenchman, is not surprising. The famous barcarole (Act 2), and the equally famous apostrophe to Fenella, when the unhappy dumb girl is overpowered by sleep (Act 3), in spite of a tendency to what is conventionally called "tremolo," were both delivered with the right expression. It need hardly be said that these differ widely from each other, depending upon very opposite means for their adequate presentment. In the animated duet with Pietro, in which Masaniello and his chief confederate (who afterwards poisons him) proclaim in fulminating accents their resolve to shake off the bonds of the oppressing foreigner, Signor Nicolini was no less happy, and his partner, Signor Bagagiolo, being the possessor of a voice more than up to the occasion, the effect upon the audience was marked. The duet was encored, and a portion of it repeated. Fenella, the dumb sister of Masaniello, finds a careful and intelligent representative in Mdlle. Girod, an eloquent "mime;" while one more capable than Madame Sinico of doing justice to the beautiful cavatina, and the rest of the music allotted to Donna Elvira, could hardly be named. Alphonso, Elvira's betrothed husband, and betrayer of Fenella—an ungrateful part at the best—is entrusted to the new-comer, Signor Edardi, who, at the first performance, omitted the only piece that could afford him any chance of musical distinction as a soloist. Further than saying that the splendid overture was played with animation; that the dance-music—only second, if, indeed, second, to that in Guillaume Tell, the incomparable tarantella in the market scene especially, was all that could be wished; and that the choruses were for the most part well given—of which, again, the beautiful prayer in the market scene may be cited as a particular instance; and all will have been written that can reasonably be expected at this time about Auber's dramatic masterpiece, which, happily, whether in an English or an Italian dress, has been familiar to us for little less than forty years.

The "rentrée" of Madame Adelina Patti (as the heroine of Rossini's Barbiere) was recorded at the time. The second appearance of this admirable artist was as Zerlina—the Zerlina of Mozart's perennial Don Giovanni, which, as of yore, brought together an assembly of music-lovers filling the theatre to the roof. There is no occasion to describe in detail Madame Patti's impersonation of this wonderfully piquant and lively creation, or to say more than that it was, as we have already for a good many years known it to be, perfection. Acting and singing were alike irreproachable, and, as a matter of course, "La ci darem la mano" (the duet in which the half-innocent, half-knowing Zerlina gives way for an instant to the seductive persuasions of Don Giovanni), together with "Batti batti" and "Vedrai carino," the two airs in which Zerlina coaxes into forgiveness her jealous and suspicious lover, Masetto, sung by Madame Patti as she is accustomed to sing them, were, as is invariably the case, encored and repeated. In M. Faure Madame Patti had a Don Giovanni worthy of her. No other such representative of this most difficult and exacting of all characters has been witnessed since Tamburini. The bearing of M. Faure is as graceful and distinguished as his acting is spirited and full of meaning. In the last scene, with the marble ghost of the Commendatore, M. Faure is really great. But not to discuss further a performance so familiar, and so generally accepted, it will suffice to add that we have rarely heard the trying air, "Finchè del vino," or the melodious serenade, "Deh vieni alla finestra" (encored), better sung. The one demands unlimited vocal fluency, the other all expression and tenderness (as, by the way, does "La ci darem"); and M. Faure showed himself a thorough master of the indispensable requisites. The Donna Anna of the evening was Madame Paoli. This new artist surprised everyone by the dramatic energy, intelligence, and force exhibited in the scene (terminating with the fine air, "Or sai che l'indegno") where the offended high-born lady narrates the story of her wrongs to the somewhat lackadaisical Don Ottavio (Signor Bettini), who is expected to do great things before his marriage, but, in the end, contents himself with singing "Il mio tesoro." The Elvira was Madame Sinico, who embodies every character she undertakes, more or less well, and few characters better than that of the neglected mistress of Don Giovanni. About Leporello, Masetto, and the Commendatore it is only requisite to say that Signori Ciampi, Tagliafico, and Capponi were their representatives. Signor Vianesi conducted.

On Saturday night Mdlle. Albani appeared as Gilda, in Verdi's Rigoletto—Signor Nicolini taking the part of the Duke, Signor Cotogni that of the miserable Court Jester, Mdlle. Scalchi that of Maddalena, and Signor Tagliafico that of Sparafucile. The chief interest in this performance was centred in Mdlle. Albani, whose gradual, but sure, progress in her art becomes nightly more evident. A more interesting Gilda, if personal appearance counts for anything, has not been known since Angiolina Bosio used so to enrapture all musical London by her impersonation as to make it seem an ungrateful task for anyone to attempt it after her. Mdlle. Albani not only looks the character thoroughly, but acts it with feeling and intelligence. The music is occasionally somewhat trying for her voice; but she has studied it conscientiously, and, for the great part, masters it with uncontrolled facility. Nothing can be more charming than her quiet and unaffected delivery of the soliloquy, "Caro nome," which immediately succeeds the impassioned duet between Gilda and her unknown lover, the fictitious student, Walter Maldè, actually Duke of Mantua, a Don Giovanni of his kind, without the peculiar philosophical theory of Don Giovanni—in fact, a most commonplace and uninteresting Don Giovanni. In the touching scene with Rigoletto, when Gilda is reclaimed by her father at the Palace of the Duke, Mdlle. Albani was not merely earnest, but showed signs of real dramatic talent; and after the well-known duet, "Si, vendetta, tremenda vendetta," when Rigoletto talks of the vengeance at hand, while Gilda only thinks of her lover, both she and Signor Cotogni were twice summoned before the foot-lights. The famous quartet in the last scene, "Bella figlia dell' amore," sung by Signor Nicolini, Mdlle. Scalchi, Signor Cotogni, and Mdlle. Albani, was unanimously asked for again, although (with excellent taste, we cannot but think) the encore was not accepted. Few, on reflection, can refuse to admit that encores rather take from, than enhance, the enjoyment of an operatic performance.

The operas performed during the present week have been Dinorah—with Madame Adelina Patti as the heroine (Monday); Guillaume Tell (Tuesday); Faust and Margherita (Thursday); and the Barbiere di Siviglia (Friday). Martha is to be repeated to-night, with Mdlle Albani as the heroine.

PROFESSOR ALBERT I. SUMNER.

Great was the shock which we all felt when reading of the terrible accident which had happened to the steamer "Atlantic;" yet, how much anguish and sorrow did it bring to families on both sides of the great deep. How much happiness, how many bright hopes and visions, how much that was good and lovable has gone down to the awful deep, there to rest till the last great trump shall summon those that sleep, and when the sea shall give up the dead. Among those who perished in the waves is Professor Albert I. Sumner, son of Hon. Increase Sumner, brother of Senator Charles Sumner. He had studied music, and was organist in Oswego, N. Y., from 1863 to 1869. But being not satisfied, he visited Europe, where he made such progress that he became organist of one of the principal churches of Dresden. In a letter from London, March 18th, he speaks touchingly of his affection for Germany, and the friends he found there, and at the same time looking westward to his home, where he hoped to have a bright career and many years of usefulness. With a sort of prophetic spirit, he feared the passage across the ocean, which to him was the passage into eternity.

Professor Sumner was highly esteemed, both as man and artist, and nowhere was he better appreciated than among the music-loving people of Germany.—Brainard's Musical World.

MILAN.—Signor Bottesini lately visited this place on his way to Paris. He is expected to return ere long.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The local season has terminated triumphantly, and the dwellers in this midland metropolis may be congratulated, not only on the quantity but also on the quality of the music provided for their delectation both by societies and private enterprise. Financially the Festival Choral Society has doubtless been as successful as usual, but artistically there has been a decided falling off, which is to be the more regretted as this Autumn the Triennal Festival will require their services, not only in the familiar choruses of Handel's Messiah and Mendelssohn's Elijah, but in the new oratorio of Arthur Sullivan, "The Light of the World,"—(a somewhat fanciful title, recalling Holman Hunt's picture with the wonderful mediæval stable lantern), and the new Cantatas of Randegger and Schira, which are to be produced sometime between August 26th and 29th, the four days fixed for the meeting. It is to be hoped that steady and diligent practice may in the meantime correct the defects complained of, and enable the society to retrieve their (formerly) well-earned laurels.

The fourth and last of the concerts of the Birmingham Musical Union—or, in other words, Messrs. Adams and Beresford's—fitly crowned the series with a well planned scheme, eclectic enough to satisfy the most catholic taste, comprising, as it did, Schumann's Quartet in E flat, for piano and strings; the Adagio in D major, from Mozart's Concerto in A, composed at Vienna in 1791 for Stadler (not to be confounded with the Abbé of that name), the famous but unprincipled clarionet player; Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat major, Op. 45; Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, Op. 31, for pianoforte alone; and, by way of grand finale, Beethoven's wonderful Septet in E flat, so familiar to the frequenters of the Monday Pops, and which is said never to have been given in Birmingham in a complete form since the year 1820. In the clarionet concerto, (or rather fragment of it) Mr. Lazarus again asserted himself most unmistakably as the highest living master of his instrument, his purity of intonation, exquisitely delicate phrasing, and absolutely faultless mechanism, delighting his hearers, who testified in the warmest manner their appreciation of so charming a performance, the same feeling being again evoked by the part so conspicuously occupied by the clarionet in Beethoven's imposing and effective work. Au reste I must say that there was a general coarseness (not to be disguised under the name of vigour) and absence of light and shade in the rendering of the instrumental pieces, which offended ears attuned to St. James's Hall and Mr. Arthur Chappell's executants. The compiler of the remarks on the programme is evidently a disciple of the "Zukunft" school, and, as such, is not satisfied with exalting his own idols but thinks it equally incumbent to depreciate others. Thus, speaking of Schumann, he not only calls him a gifted composer (which no one wishes to deny), but goes on to say that, however he may be regarded in this country, he is in Germany favourably compared with his great contemporary, Mendelssohn. The proverb as to comparisons is too trite for quotation, but if they are to be instituted between the two, so much the worse for Schumann.

Messrs. Harrison's last "Popular Concert" (so-called), drew an enormous audience to the Town Hall, Mr. Sims Reeves being undoubtedly the main attraction; and it was a source of gratification to all present (many of whom had come from a considerable distance), to find that our greatest of tenors was in marvellously fine voice, no trace of his lengthened and severe indisposition being apparent, but all the old fire, pathos, and tenderness exhibiting themselves as unmistakably as ever. Dibdin's manly sentiment in "Tom Bowling" being brought out to the fullest and raising the vast multitude to enthusiasm, still more excited by the familiar strains of "My pretty Jane," given as an encore to the old sea song. In addition to this Mr. Reeves sang Blumenthal's "Thinking of thee," a song of Mariani's, and Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Song," the latter repeated in compliance with unanimous demand. Mdlle. José Sherrington's facile execution found excellent opportunity for display in the very familiar shadow song of Dinorah; and Miss Enriquez showed that the lessons of her accomplished instructor, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, had been laid carefully to heart; while Miss Ferrari made a highly satisfactory impression on the Birmingham public alike by her agreeable voice, well-disciplined method, and a presence at once dignified and attractive. Worthy daughter of a worthy father, her future career will be watched with interest. Mr. Castle, a tenor new to this place, and indeed to London until last season, had a favourable reception, although he would have done better not to have chosen Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud," with Mr. Reeves so close at hand; Mr. Lewis Thomas received the deserved welcome of an old favourite. Mdme. Norman-Néruda contributed a violin fantasia on Der Freischütz, and Spohr's Adagio in F, besides joining Mr. Hallé—who played three of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne worte" and Chopin's Nocturne and Polonaise in A flat—in Dussek's well-known (thanks to the Monday Pops again) Andante and Rondo in B flat. Mr. Roeckel was in all respects an efficient accompanist.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The opera concerts in the central transept, which have been given for many years past, are now abolished, and on Saturday week a series was commenced in the winter concert-room, which, though of a higher order, unites with classical interest something of the fashionable attraction of its predecessors. This result is secured by giving orchestral selections of high rank to Mr. Manns' band, and by the appearance of eminent solo instrumentalists; while the vocal pieces are confided to artists from Her Majesty's Opera. Few will complain of the change, and many will be glad of it, because a real musical importance is now found where before there was nothing of the kind; and because the amateurs of good music, who love good music as much in June as in December, may indulge their tastes where formerly they could do nothing of the kind. The first concert was well attended, and proved in all respects a success. Mr. Manns' orchestra played the overture to Ruy Blas and other classical selections. Herr Hans von Bülow took part in a Concerto, besides contributing a solo; and some attractive vocal music was provided by Mdlle. Tietjens and a detachment of artists from Her Majesty's Opera. Judging by the applause of the audience, the Crystal Palace managers have hit upon exactly the right kind of entertainment for the summer months. They may now carry on the good work of artistic improvement from year's end to year's end; not countenancing in any degree the making music a mere pretext for a lot of fashionable people to come together and criticise each other's dress. Dress criticism, of course, will go on under any circumstances, but at present it can only be an accident, and not an occupation carried on under cover of the divine art. We shall be glad to note the complete success of a decided change for the better, and to find that the public know how to appreciate the good and solid above the frivolous and sham.

THE UPPER AND LOWER CITIES IN MONTALLUYAH.

(From "Another World.")

The difference of the atmosphere and the effect on the human frame between the Upper and Lower cities of Montalluyah is remarkable; those accustomed to live in the Lower city have a disposition to spring from their feet when first arriving in the Upper city. I recollect a lady—rather weakly—who seemed mad, but was rational enough; only she could not for some time resist the impulse of springing upwards. A person can be raised from the base to the top of the column (said to be three miles high), and through a shaft into the Upper city. The movement is rapid, and takes less than half-an-hour either way, whilst the journey by our external roads, in consequence of the circuits to be taken, and the ascents and descents, would, even to descend, occupy two days on a fleet horse. The passage through the Tower, however, is seldom used either for ascent or descent, except in cases of great emergency, because the great difference of the atmosphere above and below materially affects the health of the passenger. The machinery, too, requires much care and calculation, for the weight of the descending body would otherwise increase to such an extent that accidents might occur.

Accompanists, Mr. Eaton Faning and Mr. Walter Fitton.

The next public rehearsal is announced to take place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday Morning June 10th.

MRS. JOHN MACFARREN'S CONCERT.

The morning concert, annually given by the excellent pianist whose name appears above, took place on the 9th inst., in Hanover Square Rooms, and was very well attended by an appreciative audience. On all such occasions the doings of the bénéficiaire naturally takes precedence, and we will refer to them at once. Mrs. Macfarren opened the programme with a Scherzo and Allegro by Dussek, whose music, we are glad to see, receives occasional exposition at her hands. She played both movements admirably, and let us hope, turned the attention of some among her patrons to the music of a genuine master in a genuine school of art. Mrs. Macfarren was next associated with Herr Daubert in Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillante "La Gaite" for piano and violoncello; after which she played Beethoven's so-called Moonlight Sonata with capital effect, and was recalled unanimously. In the second part, Mrs. Macfarren, jointly with our admirable English violinist, Mr. Carrodus, gave Mozart's favourite Sonata in A major, finishing up the whole entertainment with two movements, Cantabile and Rondo from Haydn's Trio in G, for piano, violin (Mr. Carrodus), and violoncello (Herr Daubert). In all this varied work, the fair concert-giver was equally at home, and her performance gave unmixed satisfaction. Miss Banks, Mdlle. Gaetano, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley added much to the interest of the concert by some well chosen vocal pieces. Taken as a whole a better entertainment of the "benefit" order is pretty sure not to be given throughout the season.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

The recent performance at these concerts of Mozart's pianoforte Concerto in C (No. 14) served to introduce one of the young artists for whose welfare the prospectus showed solicitude. So much success marked the occasion that the value of the concerts was conspicuously shown, and the managers were encouraged to persevere in the course they have laid down for themselves. To Mr. W. Henry Thomas, son of Mr. Lewis Thomas, fell the honour of being the first on the list of Albert Hall débutants, and his performance, as just intimated, was a worthy beginning. The work chosen, though beautiful with all the beauty of Mozart's great genius, is very rarely heard, and hence a double interest attended its performance. We congratulate Mr. Thomas upon a very promising first appearance in a conspicuous position. He played some by no means easy music with facility, correctness, and unfailing good taste, making obvious the fact, either that he has been trained in a capital school, or that his innate musicianship has kept him on the right course. All he did was marked by strict regard for the composer whose thoughts he interpreted by unfailing intelligence, and by a modesty of style which, in these days of impudent self-assertion, was refreshing to witness. We hope that, having made so good a début, this promising young artist will enjoy opportunities, from time to time, of following up his unquestionable success.

The programmes of the week just ended have comprised the Italian symphony, Weber's Concert-Stück, played by Chevalier de Kontski; the overtures to Ruy Blas, Mock Doctor, Schubert's Rosamunde, Herold's Pré aux Clercs, and Cherubini's Deux Journées. On Monday a young lady pianist was to have introduced Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante; the accompanying overtures being those of Der Freischütz and Le Nozze di Figaro. We are glad to observe that these excellent concerts are making a sure way into public favour. No other result was possible, so long as excellence has power, and we anticipate from them very much good to art in its highest developement. Among the English works shortly to be played are Mr. Cowen's Symphony (No. 1) in C minor; a Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. Thouless; and Mr. Gadsby's overture, Andromeda.—Sunday Times.

LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

The pressure of events last week delayed our notice of the concert given in St. George's Hall, on the 8th, by the members of this Union, which has now reached its fifteenth season. Mr. Land, we are glad to observe, remains at his post as director, and is still supported by the tried ability of Miss Jane Wells, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Coates, and Mr. Lawler—artists thoroughly accomplished in the school of glees and madrigals, and well qualified in all respects for the work they have to do. The first programme of the season was a capital one. It led off with Webbe's fine glee—well known to frequenters of Mr. Leslie's concerts—"Thy voice, O harmony"; after which came Elliott's "The bees, when varying flowers are nigh;" Benet's "Flow, O my tears;" Hatton's "When evening's twilight;" Horsley's "See the chariot at hand;" Sir W. S. Bennett's "Come live with me;" and other works of kindred excellence. The solos were not less interesting than the concerted pieces. They comprised Storace's "With lonely suit," well sung by Miss Wells; Attwood's "Soldier's Dream," given by Mr. Coates; and Purcell's fine air, "Return, revolting rebels," assigned to Mr. Lawler. In addition, Mr. Sydney Smith played with much fluency and skill, Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante in B minor, and two morceaux of his own composition. Need we add that the entertainment was thoroughly enjoyable. The concerts of the Glee and Madrigal Union, it should be observed, are the only ones of their kind, and their effect is to conserve a charming and distinctive branch of real English music. On this account they have peculiar claims to support.

The second concert took place on Thursday last, and the artists—Miss Jane Wells, Messrs. Baxter, Coates, Lawler, and Land—sang some admirable specimens of the old English and Italian masters, which met with warm appreciation. The vocal music was diversified by some pianoforte playing by Mr. Walter Macfarren, who gave Schumann's "Arabesque," and his own "Berceuse" (Golden Slumbers) and "Gavotte," in each of which he obtained legitimately-earned applause. The next concert is to be given on Thursday, June 5.

STUTTGART.—A new orchestral composition, by Professor Wilhelm Speidel, was produced at the Tenth Subscription Concert. It is entitled König Helge. Symphonisches Tongemälde in drei Abtheilungen (King Helge. A Symphonic Tone-Picture in three Parts), and is founded upon Oehlenschläger's work of the same name. It met with a very flattering reception.

WEIMAR.—A musical novelty, in the shape of a Singspiel, or piece interspersed with songs, entitled Jery und Bätely, has been produced with decided success, and, according to competent judges, will make the round of the theatres of Germany. The book is by Göthe; the music by Mdme. Ingeborg von Bronsart.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The prospectus of the Italian operatic season has appeared. The season will commence on the 6th October, 1873, and close during the Carnival of 1874. The following artists are engaged: Madame Patti, for three months here and two months in Moscow; Mdlle. Albani; Mdlle. Scalchi; Signori Naudin, Nicolini, Marini, Graziani, Cotogni, Bagagiolo, and Ciampi. The subscription list is completely filled up already.

THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

The 219th Festival of the "Sons of the Clergy," held under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, was attended by a very large congregation. What are the precise objects of this excellent institution need not be dwelt on in detail. That it helps materially towards affording timely aid to necessitous clergymen, their widows and unmarried daughters, no less than towards educating, apprenticing, and providing outfits for their children, is a fact well known to our readers, musical and non-musical. The subjoined paragraph, taken from the programme, explains in a very few words all that, as matter of history, it is requisite to know:—

"The first Festival was held in St. Paul's Cathedral in the year 1655, when certain zealous members of the Church, moved with compassion for the helplessness and privations of the clergy, suffering under the calamities of those times, formed themselves into an association to alleviate their distress. This private association was soon followed by the establishment of a public body, incorporated by Royal Charter from Charles II., and which, from the circumstance that the first promoters of the Festival were all sons of clergymen, became commonly known as the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy."

Apart from history, however, with regard to its bearing on the interests of the poorer clergy and their belongings, another fuller official statement may appropriately be added, inasmuch as increased publicity can hardly fail to enhance the sympathy which right-thinking persons must inevitably feel for so excellent a cause. The duties voluntarily undertaken by the Corporation are thus succinctly and emphatically expressed:—

"To afford continuous or occasional assistance, as circumstances may suggest, to clergymen of the Established Church in England and Wales, when in need, from mental or bodily infirmity, the reverses of fortune, the heavy expenses incidental to large families, or any other cause of impoverishment beyond their own control; to grant pensions to widows of clergymen, and donations to widows in temporary difficulties who are ineligible for pensions; to grant pensions to maiden daughters of deceased clergymen on their attaining the age of 45 years, and donations to unsuccessful candidates and other maiden daughters, under 45 years of age, who may by ill-health be incapacitated from earning their own subsistence; to apprentice clergymen's children, whether they may or may not be orphans, to schools, professions, and trades, to assist them in their education at schools or colleges, and to provide outfits for them on their being placed out in the world."

No existing institution more richly merits public support; but on this point we have repeatedly dwelt, and, it is to be hoped, not altogether vainly. In 1872 we are informed that the Governors of the corporation granted donations to 251 clergymen in distressed circumstances; pensions and donations to 894 widows and aged single daughters of clergymen, and apprentice fees, outfits, and educational grants to 249 children of clergymen—in all 1,394 persons.

The full Cathedral service, which brought so large an assembly within the walls of our Metropolitan Cathedral was in the highest degree impressive. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. W. C. Webber, Succentor and Sub-Dean of the Cathedral; the Lessons were read by the Rev. H. Milman (minor canon); the Psalms were sung to Sir John Goss's Double Chant in E—one of the most tuneful and artistically perfect in Church music; and the suffrages were Tallis's immortal "Festival Use." The full Cathedral musical Church service to which we are accustomed at these anniversaries was more than usually complete and grand. The credit was due to Dr. Stainer, Sir John Goss's successor as organist at St. Paul's, under whose superintendence the whole was marshalled into order. Dr. Stainer, was, of course, the conductor. The members of his choir, some 250 in number, and the players in his orchestra, (a complete orchestra, with Mr. Weist Hill as chief violin,) were all in surplices. The selection of music was beyond criticism. In place of the usual organ voluntary we had the first two movements of Mendelssohn's magnificent Lobgesang, very effectively rendered. Of the Psalms we have spoken. The "Magnificat" ("My soul doth magnify the Lord"), and "Nunc dimittis" (Lord, now lettest thou Thy servant depart in peace"), sung to music composed expressly for the occasion by Dr. Stainer, must have impressed every hearer by their earnestness and truly devotional character—to say nothing of their scholarly musicianship. After the third Collect the choral part of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise took the place of "Anthem," and was on the whole remarkably well performed. The principal tenor solos were delivered by Mr. Kerr Gedge, and under such exceptional circumstances they could scarcely have been entrusted to one more competent to do them justice. But the entire performance—a very few drawbacks, almost inevitable, allowed for—was really excellent. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Francis James Holland, who adopted for his text St. Paul's Epistle to the Phillipians, chap. iv., verse 1—"Therefore, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for," &c., and whose eloquent discourse, as may be naturally supposed, bore more or less directly on the theme of the day's celebration. After the sermon Handel's "Hallelujah" was sung by the choir. Mr. George Cooper officiated at the organ all through with the ability for which he is noted. The "exodus" voluntaries, after the "blessing," were the "Amen" chorus, which brings to an end the Messiah, greatest of all oratorios, and a beautiful andante, one of a set of three organ pieces, composed by our distinguished musician, Mr. Henry Smart—both played in masterly style by Mr. Cooper. Altogether the service was in every sense impressive.

In the evening the stewards of the festival entertained the supporters of the benevolent exchequer of the Corporation to dinner, at Merchant Taylor's Hall. The chair was occupied by the Lord Mayor. The company present numbered nearly 200, among whom were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and many Bishops.

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

Preparations for the National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace in July are proceeding vigorously in different parts of the kingdom. Mr. Griffiths, secretary of the South Wales Choral Union, writes that the choir is busily engaged in preparing for the contest. The choir this year numbers nearly 500 voices. The second general rehearsal took place on Monday last (19th), at the Music Hall, Swansea, and others are to follow at Cardiff, Newport, and Aberdare. These rehearsals are open to the public, and are thus made the means of obtaining funds towards the expenses of the choir travelling to London. At Bristol, Mr. Stone's choir of men's voices is spoken of in the highest terms. Large audiences have already assembled to hear the music that is to be sung in competition. It is this choir, with Mr. Proudman's, that will sing against the Liverpool Representative Choir, in Class III. It is said that 400 applications were made to join the Liverpool choir, out of which the eighty voices, to which number the choirs in Class III. are limited, were chosen. The two Church choirs at Liverpool meet several times each week for practice. In London, the Tonic Sol-fa Association Choir, the Galin Choral Society, the South London Choral Association, the Stepney Tonic Sol-fa Society, the Dalston Choral Society, and others, are all actively employed on conquest bent. At Norwich, the Carrow Works Band rehearses frequently; at Woolwich, Mr. Lawson's capital Bugle Band is in training; and at Gloucester the Volunteer Artillery Band sounds the note of preparation. An interesting feature of the forthcoming meetings will be a competition between the Boys' Home Brass Band, the Harrow Continental College Band, the St. Marylebone Schools' Band, and the band of the St. Mary's Orphanage, Hounslow. The young members of these institutions will contend for prizes that have been offered by Messrs. Besson, Chappell, and other firms, as well as for a purse of sovereigns. We understand that twenty-one sopranos, twenty-three contraltos, seventeen tenors, and twenty-two basses have entered the respective classes for solo singers. The contest that is to take place betwen trumpeters cannot fail to remind classic readers of a similar trial of skill in days of old mentioned by the ancient historian. The examinations for certificates of merit in any branch of musical knowledge are to take place on July 2nd and 4th, in the concert-room of the Crystal Palace. These examinations being open to all comers, free of entrance fee or any other charge, constitute one of the numerous advantages to the art of music included in the plan of the National Music Meetings.

The Gainsborough picture, recently bought by Messrs. Agnew for the sum of £6,300, has been sold by that firm to Mr. Graham, of Glasgow, with a profit, it is stated, of 10 per cent.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1873.

THE "land of brown heath and shaggy wood" may be, and, judging by results is, "fit nurse for the poetic child," but it has done little in the way of rearing the child musical. Our brethren north of the Tweed are not an emotional race. A hard-headed, practical set of folk, they look upon life as so much capital to be invested where the highest dividends are paid in cash. The exceptions to this rule are many no doubt, but it would be vain to look for them in the direction of music. Scotland has given birth to poets many; to musicians none—that is to say, of more than local fame. What explains the phenomenon? It cannot be the result of physical influences. The North has a music of its own, as characteristic as that of the more impulsive South; and musical history tells how Scotland could give a stimulus to the powers of a Mendelssohn, the results of which will endure for ever. Nor have we any right to assume that music is foreign to the genius of a people who have excelled in all other exercises of intellect and imagination. Yet the fact remains that one may search from the Tweed to John o'Groat's and from the Hebrides to the German ocean without coming upon the traces of a musical composer or executant worthy of even moderate rank. Scotland, in fact, has done nothing hitherto for the "divine art," in respect of which it has been scarcely more fertile than the summit of Ben Lomond. Again we ask for an explanation, and, awaiting a reply, we can only hazard a guess, which is this—Has the "Scottish religion" anything to do with it? We say the "Scottish religion" advisedly, because the religion of Scotland is, in some important respects, quite sui generis. Its creed appeals to the emotions much as would the books of Euclid, were a tremendous penalty attached to failure in solving any problem, or demonstrating any theorem; and its practice is about as unlovely a thing as may be found within the circumference of our beautiful world. What must be the effect of regular attendance at a Scottish kirk we can only imagine with the horror of those who look down an unfathomable depth. To say nothing of the hour-long sermons devoted to theological mathematics, or the weary prayers which are often sermons in disguise, there is the singing—so-called by courtesy. Who that has heard a genuine Scotch precentor uplift his voice, and meander through "Dundee," followed at irregular intervals and at leisure by the congregation, will forget his feelings? Yet the Scottish religion sees a particular sanctity in these discordant whinings, and fancies them acceptable to the great Object of worship, in Whose special Sanctuary are heard the songs of angel and archangel, and of "harpers harping with their harps." What wonder that such practices, sanctioned by all the authority of a Church which looks upon anything more artistic as unholy, should have a deadening influence upon the musical talent of the people? The result is inevitable; and while Scotchmen are taught that all music, save the drawling of psalms, is vain and godless, music is not likely to make Scotland her home.

Happily there has been a stirring of late in the valley of dry bones. Organs are looked upon in church with less of pious horror, and we hear of choral societies springing up all over the country as fast as the weight of religious censorship lessens. To crown the first act in the musical development of Scotland, there will be a week's Festival in Glasgow next November. Fancy it, Reverend Mucklewrath—a real musical Festival, with its Messiahs, Elijahs, and what not; with its singing-men and singing-women, its fiddlers and trumpeters, under the shadow of Knox's monument, and within sight of unnumbered kirks! Yet so it is, and we in the South rejoice at the fact, being glad to welcome Scotland to the musical brotherhood of nations.

Our excellent correspondent in Glasgow has sent us some particulars of the coming event, and, to honour them as far as we can, they shall have a place in this leading column. Here are the particulars in our correspondent's own words:—

The promoters of the Festival have now concluded their arrangements, a sketch of which I send you. There are to be in all six concerts, four in the evening and two in the morning. The first is to be given on Tuesday evening, Nov. 4 (Elijah), followed by a miscellaneous concert on Wednesday morning. On Wednesday evening Eli will be performed, under the conductorship of Sir Michael Costa himself. Thursday evening is devoted to a second grand miscellaneous concert; and on Friday evening, for the first part, Mr. Henry Smart's sacred cantata, Jacob, specially written for the Festival, will be produced. The second part will include a new Psalm by Mr. Lambeth, and Gounod's Gallia. On Saturday morning the Messiah. The vocalists already engaged are Mdlle. Tietjens, Miss Carola (specially engaged for Sir Michael Costa's Eli), Miss Edith Wynne, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Santley. The orchestra is to consist of nearly seventy performers, all selected from the leading London societies, with Mr. Carrodus as chef d'attaque. The choruses are to be sung by the Glasgow Choral Union. I may add that this society gave a concert last Saturday in our Cathedral. The programme consisted entirely of excerpts from Elijah and Eli. The performance was an exceptionally fine one, the members of the choir being at their very best. The unequivocal success achieved on the occasion promises well for the execution of the choral music at the coming festival, or, as a local paper styles it, "the jubilee of feasts."

Bravo! Glasgow, and when November arrives we, Deo volente, will journey north to see what comes of this new thing under the (Scottish) sun.

STETTIN.—The principal feature at the last concert given by the Musical Union was Schumann's work, Der Rose Pilgerfahrt, for solos and chorus. The tenor music was entrusted to Herr Kabisch, who acquitted himself of his task to the entire satisfaction of a numerous audience. The choruses were wonderfully effective, being very well given by the members of the Union. Herr Ersfeldt played a Violin Solo by David. The other compositions were "Abendlied," for chorus, by Eitner, and two songs from Schubert's Winterreise.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE Sunday Times said, in the course of its notice of Don Giovanni at Covent Garden:—

"Don Giovanni is at the head of classical operas, and, happily, there are enough amateurs of such things in London to make a perceptible difference in the appearance of the 'house' when they add their numbers to the customary fashionable loungers. No doubt, very many went to hear Madame Patti alone. Such were the 'swells' who hob-a-nobbed between the acts at the entrance to the stalls. Said one, 'Patti's chawming, 'pon soul.' 'Chawming,' responded another. 'Anything pwetty yet?' asked No. 3. 'I've just come, don't you know?' 'Yaas,' was the reply, 'we had a vewy pwetty air, about a quawtaw of an houaw ago.' 'Really! Is this the opewa with the Shadow Dance?' 'No, that's Dinorah.' 'Aw! deuced sorry.' Upon these people, of course, Mozart was well-nigh lost; but it is a good thing that we have an artist able to draw them within Mozart's influence."

Does the conversation of the "swells" represent the average musical intelligence of operatic loungers?

OUR little friend, The Echo, has waxed figurative of late. Mark how he speaks of Bülow at the Wagner Concert:—

"But the Huldingungsmarsch—a great military march—was the most effective climax of all. Here it was that Hans von Bülow ceased to be conductor of an orchestra, and became a military commander—now hurrying on his troops, now shaking a hand charged with imperative vehemence, now pointing with a drawn sword to the foe, then turning half round in rapt excitement, almost motionless, ceasing even to beat, like one watching breathlessly a charge of cavalry, whilst the thunder of artillery broke to the right and the left as the troops dashed over the plain; then riding himself into the thick of battle, and, like one of Tennyson's own knights, bearing all down before him. We never assisted at any such intensely emotional and dramatic display of music; we never heard anything so unlike the stage, and so terribly like the real thing. We shall be borne out for once by Wagnerites and all others present last night when we say that two German words alone express adequately the effect produced—"ganz stupend!" The conductor himself was so well pleased with his soldiers that, contrary to the printed threat, no repetition was required. He thanked them loudly and heartily, and joined in the applause."

All which is bosh, and utterly irredeemable twaddle.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.—The third concert of the season of the above society took place on Wednesday, 14th May, and was attended by a large and fashionable audience. The programme was a good one. The first part was devoted to compositions of R. Schumann. The concert opened with a trio (pianoforte, Herr Hause; violin, Mdlle. Friese; violoncello, Herr Schuberth), the performance of which was all that could be desired. Miss Hincks played a solo on the pianoforte, Herr Schuberth a solo ("Abendlied") on the violoncello, and the "vocalisms" were entrusted to Miss Kate Thomson and Miss Grace Armytage. The second part opened with a sonata by Beethoven, played by Herr Hause (pianoforte) and Mdlle. Friese (violin). The vocalists were Monsieur Motison and Miss Cullen. The lady made her first appearance in public on the occasion, and sang the "Sailor boy's farewell." She was rather nervous at the commencement, but it soon wore off, and she was favourably received. Miss Grace Armytage rendered "Sweet bird" in a very effective manner, and Mdlle. Jansen played a harp solo in her best manner.

MISS MARY FISHER, a young and clever pianist, gave a Soirée Musicale at the Atheneum, Camden Road, on Friday evening the 17th inst., on which occasion she performed several solos by classical composers, gaining much and deserved applause from her numerous friends and supporters who were present. Miss Fisher also took the pianoforte part in many concerted pieces, in conjunction with Messrs. Zerbini and G. H. Girtin, doing full justice to them all. The soirés opened with Beethoven's sonata in F minor, played extremely well by the bénéficiaire, who also gave with effect an impromptu by Schubert, three pieces by Chopin, Kirchner and Schumann, and (by desire) Weber's "La Gaite," in all of which she proved herself a most able and talented executant. In Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 12, for violin and pianoforte, in Mozart's trio in E, and one of Reissiger's trios she was loudly and deservedly applauded. Some songs by Haydn, Blumenthal, and Donizetti, &c., were sung by the Misses Zerlina Zerbini and Julian, which varied the programme and gave much pleasure to all present. Mr. William Carter accompanied the vocal music.

MDLLE. IDA HENRY, a young and excellent pianist, gave her annual concert on Saturday last, at St. George's Hall, which was fashionably attended. Mdlle. Ida Henry is a pianist of the classical school, as was proved by her admirable playing of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 12, for violin and pianoforte, in conjunction with M. Colyns, a Belgian violinist of repute. Mdlle. Henry also gave two solos by Schumann and Chopin, and Bach's Gavotte in D, in all of which pieces she gained the approbation of those present. With Mdme. A von Asten Mdlle. Henry gave a faithful interpretation of Mozart's Sonata in D, for two pianofortes, which was well received. M. Colyns is a capital violinist of the Belgian school. He played a solo by Vieuxtemps and was recalled, and in Beethoven's Romance in A, gained the approbation of the audience. Mdlle. Nita Gaetano and Miss Helen Muir were the vocalists. Miss Helen Muir, who is a pupil of Mdme. Græffenhagen, made her début on the occasion and met with decided success. She possesses a well-trained voice, which she displayed to advantage in Meyerbeer's "Ah! mon fils," and in Rossini's "Una voce." She was recalled after each song. Mr. A. Thouless presided at the pianoforte.

Mr. and Mrs. Cheshire's concert took place on Thursday evening, May 15th, and attracted a large assemblage of their friends and patrons. Mrs. Cheshire has long been favourably known as a pianist of no mean degree of talent, which was exemplified by her performance, in a style that left nothing to be desired, of Thalberg's fantasia from L'Elisir d'Amore. She was also heard to advantage with Mr. Cheshire in Parish Alvars and Czerny's duet from Linda, for harp and pianoforte. Both artists rendered justice to this brilliant and effective piece, and they were loudly applauded. Mr. John Cheshire proved himself an able executant on the harp in a new fantasia, composed by himself for the occasion, on airs from Lucia, and a "Morceaux Caractéristique," by the late Parish Alvars, which was done every justice to by Mr. Cheshire, who also played, with his pupil, Miss Carpenter, a grand duet on two harps on Irish melodies, both performers receiving the well-merited applause of the audience. The vocal music was good. Sir John Goss's quartett, "There's beauty on the mountain," was admirably sung by the Misses G. Stewart and A. Newton with Messrs. G. Perren and A. Matthison. Miss L. Porter sang a song of Linley's; Mr. G. Perren gave with his usual effect "Alice, where art thou?" which was encored. Mr. W. H. Cummings sang a new song of his own, "Just as of old." Mr. A. Matthison gave with artistic feeling a song from Bennett's Songs of the Sea, "Would you be a sailor's wife." Mr. Matthison recited between the parts a clever and effective little sea story, written by himself, called "The little Hero." It was received with much and deserved favour by the audience. Miss Banks, Miss Grace Stewart, Miss Osborne Williams, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Signor Caravoglia diversified the programme with some of their usual songs and ballads. A composition by Mr. John Cheshire entitled "A dream of joy," arranged for three harps, harmonium, and pianoforte, played by the Misses Carpenter, Kate Skuse, Mrs. J. Cheshire, Mrs. F. Goodban, and the composer, was well received, and reflects credit on Mr. Cheshire's abilities as a writer of concerted pieces. Messrs. W. Ganz, C. J. Hargitt, and Sidney Smith presided attentively at the pianoforte as accompanists with their usual judgment.

Mr. George Tolhurst's choir gave their second concert of the season at the Norwood Institute, on Tuesday, 20th inst., when a selection of part songs was performed. Amongst them "The Wreath," (Benedict), two of the "Shakspeare songs," (Macfarren), and "Little Celandine," (Gounod), were the most noticeable. The programme included a selection (eleven numbers), from the conductor's oratorio Ruth. Every piece was greatly applauded; the duet, "Surely we will return with thee," sung by Miss Jenny Brown and Miss Kate Worth had to be repeated. When will one of our great societies give us a rendering of this much talked-of composition?

THE DEATH SOLACE.

(From "Another World.")

From a little insect, my men of science extracted a material from which is prepared a potion agreeable to the taste. This is administered to the patient as soon as the physicians are satisfied that life is ebbing fast; and it, at the same time, calms and rouses the dying man. Within five minutes after it has been taken, all signs of suffering disappear, and the countenance acquires a calm expression, succeeded by a smile of joy rarely seen in the most perfect health. The faculties of the dying man are brightened, and his sensations rendered delightful. He looks calmly on death, makes his dispositions with the serenity of robust health, converses familiarly with those dear to him, gives them his blessing, and passes away as though he were leaving only for a short and pleasant journey. I have seen many exhort their children and relatives, and speak of their departure for another world with an eloquence seldom heard on other occasions.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

The Standard of Thursday contained the following:—

"Musical doings appear to concentrate themselves in the large building at Kensington as the fittest arena of such displays, since now that the daily Exhibition concerts, under Mr. J. Barnby's direction, are taking place, and that morning organ performances are contributed by Dr. Stainer and others, and evening concerts are held here with more or less frequency, a music-seeking person could hardly fail to be suited, at whatever hour he might direct his steps Kensington-wards. The daily 'Exhibition' classical concerts we are glad to see gaining ground with the general public. Their high character has been persistently maintained, and their distinctive purpose steadily kept in view. The first of the young native musicians whom the directors have put forward is Mr. W. H. Thomas, son of Mr. Lewis Thomas, the popular basso, who has appeared during this week as an exponent of pianoforte music, choosing no less a work than Mozart's concerto in C (No. 14), in which to appeal to public favour. This composition, bearing the impress of its composer's genius, like most of his works, is too seldom heard. The beauty of the concerto would obtain for it frequent and repeated hearing but that the difficulties which stand in the way of the pianist are not lightly to be overcome. It is, therefore, the more pleasing duty to be able to record that Mr. W. H. Thomas played the concerto in a masterly manner, without affectation, and with a steadiness which proved that he had studied in a thoroughly solid school. We hope to hear Mr. Thomas again and often."

A TESTIMONIAL TO MR. GROVE AND MR. MANNS.

(From "The Choir," May 17.)

The following "Suggestion" from a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, which appeared in last Friday's issue of that paper, will, we believe, meet with the cordial approval of our readers:—

"As the directors of the Crystal Palace announce their intention of celebrating the commencement of the twentieth year of the existence of the Palace by a festival, at which honour will be done to the memory of the Prince Consort and Sir Joseph Paxton, would it not be an equally fitting opportunity for English musicians, professional and amateur, to offer to Mr. George Grove and Mr. Manns some testimony of their regard and esteem? Great as may be our debt to the dead for the conception of the idea which has been worked out with so much benefit to the public, and, on the whole, with considerable advantage to art and artists at Sydenham, it should not be forgotten that we owe still more to the living, and that if it had not been for the untiring energy and ability of Mr. Grove, coupled with the equally noteworthy executive talent of Mr. Manns, we should never have obtained the Saturday Concerts, which constitute the chief claim of the Crystal Palace upon the support of musicians, and indeed of the art-loving members of the community generally. The excellence of the performance of the instrumental music, under the beat of Mr. Manns on the one hand, and the richly annotated programmes by Mr. Grove on the other, enable the amateur not only to enjoy but to appreciate the works of the great masters to an extent formerly unknown, except to the favoured few at the more exclusive concerts of the old societies, and, therefore, as public educators of the highest class, they deserve some recognition. Instead, then, of leaving the task to a more intelligent posterity, it would surely be well for English musicians to bestir themselves and to show their gratitude, if it be only in the simple form of a congratulatory address to those who have so conscientiously done their duty."

That such a testimonial as is here suggested would be nothing more than a well-earned reward for a long and unwearied effort to supply Englishmen with orchestral performances, equal if not superior to those which can be heard abroad, must be evident, and that Mr. Grove has undertaken the by no means easy task of editing, and to a considerable extent of writing, the concert books purely as a labour of love is, we believe, generally known; for although in his official position as Secretary to the Crystal Palace Company he might naturally have been expected to take an interest in any project for the improvement of the building and its attractions, it is obvious that such a task could not by any process of directorial arrangement of labour be brought within the duties of the Secretariat. It may be assumed, therefore, that he has, sponte sua, done this useful work with a success which has been so often commented upon in our own columns and those of our contemporaries that it calls for no further notice. "Good wine needs no bush," and assuredly such matter as that which "G" supplies the Sydenham audience week by week, during the season of the winter concerts, carries its value upon the face of it in the eyes of all who are capable of appreciating good music and good writing. We have in fact, in all these notices a combination of the two qualifications so needful in musical criticism, and so seldom found in one and the same man—a thorough acquaintance with the art and its literature, and literary power of a high order. Nor does Mr. Grove's title to honour end here, for it may fairly be supposed that the selection of the music, on which so much depends has been largely due to him in conjunction with Mr. Manns. And on this head it is absolutely impossible to find room for anything but praise. The production of all the great symphonies; the energy displayed in unearthing works which but for the zeal of these gentlemen, as in the case of some of Schubert's MSS., might have remained for ever unknown; the performance of new compositions by young German and English writers—these points and many others will naturally occur to the reader in thinking over the musical gains from the Crystal Palace Concerts. Turning next to the execution of the music, with which Mr. Manns is more immediately connected, we find the same cause for congratulation. Uniform excellence is the rule with his band, a coarse or unsteady rendering of a great work is unknown, and except, of course, on minor points, where individual tastes may fairly differ, critics of all degrees have been unanimous in their praises. It is indeed difficult to avoid the use of language which may seem to readers at a distance to be unduly laudatory in speaking of this matter, and we will, therefore, say no more, believing that the suggestion made in the pages of our contemporary needs little commendation at our hands. What we have written we have written in all sincerity, because we believe that honest work in the cause of art meets with too little encouragement in these days, when mere popularity hunters so often receive the honours due to their more worthy but less pushing brethren; and although we are well aware that Mr. Grove and Mr. Manns desire no higher reward than that inevitably springing from the mens conscia recti, we deem it our duty as musical journalists, heartily to second the proposal which has been made at such an auspicious moment.

LA FILLE DE MADAME ANGOT.

The question of the value of opéra-bouffe as an entertainment, and its effect upon musical and dramatic art, has been so frequently discussed, and must have been so wearisome, that we prefer to let it alone. It may be very good taste or it may be very bad taste to like opéra-bouffe, the books of these operas may be frivolous or amusing, the music may be imitated or of original merit. One thing, however, is quite certain, and that is, we like to see in London the successful plays of the great theatrical capitals. When Paris produces a novelty we are anxious to hear all about it; when Brussels starts a new opera it is essential we should be familiar with its airs and choruses. Within a few hours of the production of La Fille de Madame Angot at the Folies-Dramatiques, in Paris, at the close of last February, the English public were, in these columns, fully informed of the pleasure in store for the lovers of light music and a bright, effective plot. We were pleasantly excited about the play, and anxious to hear the new and clever music by Charles Lecocq. Informed that the new opera was originally produced in Brussels, where its success was unquestionable; distinctly impressed with the fact that a story had been selected entirely free of offence and unworthy suggestion; convinced that it was more like comic opera than opéra-bouffe; persuaded that the music was not unworthy the attention of musicians—we were naturally anxious to become better acquainted with La Fille de Madame Angot. It is vexatious to be behindhand in these matters. There was a wonderful conspirators' chorus; we wanted to hear it. There was a captivating valse; we desired to dance to it. There was a fish-woman's ballad, romances for tenors, duets for female voices, and finally a great vocal passage of arms between two jealous women sprung from the gutter, who suddenly throw off their refinement and return to their original slang. We wished to hear all this, and to say if we also, in England, where opéra-bouffe is not a neglected art, endorsed the popular verdict concerning Madame Angot's daughter. Thanks to the enterprise of M. Humbert, director of the Théâtre des Fantasies-Parisiennes in Brussels, our wishes can be gratified. This energetic gentleman has brought over La Fille de Madame Angot, the valse, the chorus, the romances, and the duets, and, more than this, introduces to England the principal members of the company responsible for the original Brussels success. We are able now to see Clairette, the daughter of the famous Parisian fish-woman, Mdme. Angot, adopted by the rough-and-ready folks of the Halle, and perplexed between the rival attractions of Pomponnet, the barber, and Ange Pitou, the poet. We can follow the woman's war between the old friends, Mdlle. Lange, the actress, and Clairette, the fleuriste, over this same Ange Pitou, a disreputable young rascal, with a fancy for verse-making and a handsome face. We watch the schemings of the actress to defeat her simple friend, the charming indifference of the poet as he is knocked about like a shuttlecock from one to the other, and finally, after a war of words between Clairette and Mdlle. Lange, in the choicest argot of the Halles, we rejoice to find that Clairette gives up Ange Pitou as a bad job, and marries the barber.

The music of this opera is really delightful in parts. The conspirators' chorus, sung in unison by rich voices, with staccato effect, won the whole house; the valse, a very pretty fancy, instantly brightened up the audience, and would have been listened to over and over again with pleasure; the ballad of Madame Angot, given with stirring dramatic effect by Mdme. Delorme, was heartily encored; while here and there songs and duets, romances and pleasant musical fancies, persuaded every one of the cleverness and taste of Charles Lecocq. It is a pity, then, that such good wine should be wasted in such a deluge of water. We hear a song and are charmed; we have to wait half-an-hour before we get another. Our ears are fascinated with a melody, and we have waited so long for it that we become vexed when it so instantly disappears. The long-expected chorus exceeds our warmest anticipations, but away it goes like a will-o'-the-wisp, and leaves us in the darkness of the verbose libretto. There is a suspicion of humour in the book, and a wealth of melody in the music; but the extreme length of the entertainment seriously threatens the favourable impression which should be stamped by such a work. The new opera is fairly interpreted, and, on the whole, well sung. Pauline Luigini and Jeanne d'Albert appear as Clairette and Mdlle. Lange, painstaking actresses and vocalists of fair and average merit. They both have spirit, if little taste or expression. On the other hand, M. Mario Widmer, the Ange Pitou, is a graceful and very clever actor, and sings with admirable feeling. Nothing could be better than the Amaranthe of Mdme. Delorme—a small part acted and sung with complete efficiency. Carefully trained by M. Theodore Warnots, the band and chorus did their work remarkably well, and the famous "conspirators' chorus" was encored as much for the skill of the performers as the charm of the composition. The verdict on La Fille de Madame Angot will certainly be favourable.

DINORAH AND MADAME PATTI.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Meyerbeer's penultimate opera, Dinorah, holds its ground in this country for a twofold reason. It has, to begin with, the charm of an imaginative yet pastoral story, so treated as strictly to preserve local colour. Nothing more Bretonesque could be found in Brittany. The simple piety of the lowly folk who alone take part in the drama, and their strong superstitions, are as truthfully characteristic as are the dresses they wear. To witness Dinorah, in fact, is to read a page of Breton life. Who will doubt that this form of realism is a great advantage to the work? Meyerbeer evidently thought so; and he pushed it to an extent which, in less capable hands, might have been dangerous. There is no parallel in opera to the delightful idyll with which the last act opens. After the storm and excitement of the night scene, and when the fate of Dinorah and Hoel is yet in suspense, the curtain rises on a landscape bathed in the sunshine of morning. An unknown hunter appears, rifle in hand, singing of the joys of the chase. He goes, and a reaper enters, whetting his scythe to the rhythm of his own music. He departs, and is followed by two goatherds, who exchange their rustic greetings, and presently talk, with the returned hunter and reaper, of the night's tempest. "Let us never forget to pray," says the hunter, and, kneeling down, the four offer their morning tribute of thanks. All this while the action of the opera is arrested. Dinorah, Hoel, and Correntino are forgotten, and we give ourselves up to the poetic influences of one of the most charming pastorals that poet ever conceived. Truly nothing in opera shows more daring than the working out of this episode; and never was daring more clearly justified by success. As for Meyerbeer's music, it is a masterpiece of that art in composition which can reflect with perfect truth the spirit of events and even of locality. The Bretons may not possess the infinitely diversified rhythms of Dinorah; still less may they have melodies equal to the delicious themes which crowd upon each other through the opera. Nevertheless, one enjoys a sense of fitness, almost unique in its degree, when listening to Meyerbeer's strains. The enjoyment is due, perhaps, to feeling rather than perception, but its existence is the greatest tribute that can be paid to the composer's skill. That Dinorah will outlive Meyerbeer's largest works may safely be said. It is true to nature, as well as exquisite art. In England Dinorah has had good fortune, apart from its own attractiveness, thanks to those who have played the chief character with success. Meyerbeer's rustic maiden is no ordinary member of the large group of operatic heroines who lose their senses. Generally speaking, the "mad parts" in lyric drama are easy, as far as satisfying conventional requirements goes. Let down the back hair and allow one tress to float wildly across the breast, press the temples convulsively with both hands, stare hard at nothing, and plunge about the stage in the most irregular of moods—voilà tout! Moreover, the mad heroine is usually seen under circumstances which make these demonstrations all that are required. But with Dinorah the case is very different, and to meet it the subtlest powers of art are necessary. The Breton maiden is a harmless maniac who wanders about the fields with her goat, loved and protected by everybody, as though she were a "little one." Here is no case of dishevelled tresses, galvanic starts, and vacant stares. Dinorah, the child-woman, decks herself with flowers, sings to her goat, prattles to all she meets, and is quite happy, save when she loses her shadow, or when some dim picture of the past floats before her obscured mental vision. How to represent such a character as this in the perfection of its unnaturalness is a problem the greatest artist may be proud to solve. That Mdme. Patti solved it long ago need scarcely be said, but her performance on Monday was a triumph more complete than any previously gained in the same part. The Dinorah of Meyerbeer, finished to the smallest detail, appeared on the stage, and at no time was attention called to the means by which Madame Patti worked out a result so natural as entirely to conceal its art. It would be easy to dwell long upon the thousand subtle points in Madame Patti's acting, but we prefer to indicate the chief of them all—one never so prominent before. Throughout the first two acts Dinorah had appeared in the happiness of unconscious childhood, clouded now and then like an April sky, but, like it, soon re-brightening. At the beginning of the third act, when reason is restored to her, the childish gladness vanished, Dinorah had woke up to that which Wordsworth called the "awfulness of life"—the life that, according to Shelley, "like a doom of many-coloured glass stains the white radiance of eternity." Nothing could be more impressive than this change. A pained look succeeded to the smile of insanity, and, even in the height of her joy, Dinorah's aspect was chastened and subdued. With a master-stroke, therefore, did Madame Patti finish a performance which those who followed it attentively will not soon forget. It is needless to tell how she sang the familiar music, or what applause the audience showered upon her at every opportunity.

A CONCERT of a popular character, consisting of ballads, part songs, &c., will be given this evening, in the Albert Hall The solo vocalists announced are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Dones, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Mr. Sims Reeves is to sing "Tom Bowling," Frederic Clay's new song, "'Tis better not to know," and to join Madame Sherrington in the "Miserere Scene," from Il Trovatore. The choir will be composed of the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby, and are to sing, amongst other pieces, Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God." A special feature in this performance is the fact of its commencing at seven o'clock and terminating at nine.

A PROVINCIAL AT THE ITALIAN OPERA.

DEAR MR. "WORLD,"—Being up from the country—Briary Brambles is my abode—I went, through the kindness of a London friend, to the Royal Italian Opera last night. Masaniello, which I had seen and heard before, was the entertainment provided, and an enjoyable repast it proved. Of course my taste can hardly be said to be very refined, for in our rural district (which is now looking very green, no thanks to the east wind,) fine music is something imagined but rarely heard. But I suppose I ought to tell you a "bit of my mind" respecting what I heard. Well, after saying that the overture, (which I have known ever since I was so high—please to imagine I'm placing my right hand about two feet from the ground), was well played—I mustn't use superlatives or you'll laugh at my country expressions, and besides it is not easy to get 80 gentlemen to play very piano—I must speak of the chief characters. First then of the dames: Nothing like a little French, it makes us nobodies seem as somebodies when we use it. Madame Sinico and the danseuse who sustained the part of Fenella must have my expression of approbation. The former sang well; that is to say, she proved herself the useful little lady (as I see in your paper so much read in our part—she is often styled) on this occasion; and I do not think she received as much applause as she was entitled to. But the other lady, if she didn't sing—and of course she didn't as she was dumb—acted; and really, Sir, her acting spoke as eloquently as the book I held in my hand, which by the way I did not look at, for half the fun is to buy a book and the other half not to think anything more of it afterwards. That is my usual practice. That very ungrateful part, Alfonso, was sustained—no matter by whom; you may be sure by no one very grand, as no artist would care to be associated with a character in every way so objectionable. Signor "Bag-o-jelly," as I heard some person call him, was a satisfactory Pietro, his rich bass voice being "all there" in the great duet, which was encored. Fortunately this piece does not require delicate vocalisation. The patriotic fisherman who eventually wears a crown is certainly one of Signor Nicolini's best assumptions. The character of the music, excepting in one piece, is in every way fitted to this gentleman's voice and style. The delivery of energetic passages which need the full voice is his forte, and therefore when he sings forte, he is at his best. You may take it for granted, then, that in the duet with "Bag-o-jelly," he too was "all there." There is such a thing as being a shade below tune in mezzo-voce singing, and the voice being very tremulous—a certain kind of cultivation brings this state of things about. I leave you to infer what the singing of the celebrated "Sleep Song" was; and this was the exception to which I refer. But I must not write more, or you will deem your country correspondent tedious.—Yours, 17*th May*, 1873. J. CHAWBACON.

REVIEWS.

A. HAMMOND & Co.

Berlin Galop. By GUSTAV MICHAELIS.

THIS galop is one of the simplest kind; a child might play it a prima vista. But it is none the less animated and stimulating.

Daheim Waltzes. By JOSEF GUNG'L.

THESE waltzes are more characteristic and striking than the set previously noticed. Some of the themes show great ingenuity of construction, and go far to secure that freshness which is so hard to obtain within the limits of a dance form. We have nothing but praise for Herr Gung'l's efforts in the case before us.

Bruder Lustig Galop. By FRANZ BUDIK.

A FAIR average production, by a composer previously unknown to us.

Copenhagen Waltz. By JOSEF GUNG'L.

AN average example of Herr Gung'l's facile invention and good taste.

CHAPPELL & Co.

Polonaise. By IGNACE GIBSONE.

IN the not very large repertoire of Polonaises, we know few more charming and graceful compositions than this.

J. B. CRAMER & Co.

My White Rose. Song. Written and composed by LOUSA GRAY.

PATHETIC words, and expressive music, a criticism which conveys much in little.

JOSEPH WILLIAMS.

O speak not dear Annie, so gaily. Ballad. Words by JAMES SPILLING. Music by CHARLES EDWIN NOVERRE.

A SIMPLE ballad in F major, which will please many tastes.

WILKIE, WOOD & Co.

Eventide. For the Pianoforte. Composed by J. LEA SUMMERS.

A somewhat pretentious, but withal effective, composition in G flat major, which may be set before amateurs of cultivated taste. Writers for the piano should be encouraged to produce works of this kind, as a set-off against the countless effusions intended for no higher purpose than the gratification of school-girl taste. Mr. Summers may hardly hope to see his piece a favourite inside Minerva House, but all connoisseurs will applaud it as a good specimen of a good sort.

ST. JAMES'S MUSIC AND PIANOFORTE COMPANY.

I dreamt that I passed through Fairyland. Written by Mrs. M. A. BAINES. Composed by EDMUND WIEHLER.

A song not much, if anything, above commonplace. We marvel why composers think it worth while to publish their merest small-talk. Authors do not make notes of daily gossip and request the public to buy them.

NOVELLO, EWER & Co.

The Lord is my strength. A short, easy, full Anthem for Christmas day. Composed by ALBERT LOWE.

MR. LOWE writes with the gravity and earnestness of a true composer for the Church. This little anthem is well adapted to meet the wants of small choirs, and cannot fail of acceptance when looked at from the higher ground of religious edification. Moreover, it shows a thorough musicianly spirit, and that rare gift, the ars celare artem.

Eily's Reply. Song. Written and composed by ALFRED B. ALLEN.

EILY'S reply was no reply at all, in the ordinary sense. Patrick urged his suit, and the maiden laid her head upon his breast, which, says he,

"Was her sure sign
That she would be mine,
In answer to words I addressed."

This satisfactory condition of things is illustrated by simple and appropriate music, the whole making a song adapted to please.

B. WILLIAMS.

The Enchantress Waltz. By ANNIE MINOT.

THESE waltzes are tuneful and pretty; easy to play, and very dansante.

E. C. BOOSEY.

A Land where Beauty cannot fade. Trio, for Soprano, Contralto and Tenor. The Poetry by M. H. The Music by W. H. CUMMINGS.

ANYTHING from Mr. Cummings' graceful and scholarly pen is welcome, especially when, as in the case before us, that pen appears at its best. The composer has caught the spirit of the poetry, and given it expression by help of rare taste and skill. That the Trio will make its way both in public and private cannot be doubted by those who believe in the power of excellence.

She like a Seraph sings. Song. Poetry by L. S. Music by W. H. CUMMINGS.

MR. CUMMINGS has so often sung this charming song that all we have to do here is to direct the attention of our readers to its publication. The music is well adapted for amateur use, and the sentiment of the verses will obtain a welcome in every home.

Cruelty to Animals.

(From "Another World.")

It seems that they manage certain matters in certain distant planets better than they do here. The author of Another World says:—

"Cruelty to animals, even not intended for food, entails so much disgrace that it is an offence of the rarest occurrence. My laws provide various punishments, according to the grade of the offender and the nature of the offence. If a common man were cruel to his horse he would be compelled to draw his merchandize by hand. If the offence were committed by one of high position the punishment would be more severe, and not only would the offender be treated as though unworthy of exercising power over good animals, and consequently deprived of his horses, but he would be supplied with a vicious horse, and, perhaps, compelled to ride along a dangerous path, so the better to appreciate the gentleness of the horse maltreated. Cattle are treated with great kindness, harshness being supposed to deteriorate the excellence of the meat."

CARLO PATTI.

Carlo Patti died at St. Louis, Mo., on March 17, of consumption.

"Carlo Patti was born in the green-room of the Theatre Royal, Madrid, during the performance of the opera of Norma, in the winter of 1842. His mother, then a popular prima donna, on the evening of his birth, lent her superb voice to the first two acts of that sublime creation, but was forced, from her indisposition, to desist from attempting any further strain, and retired to her room, where, shortly after, the celebrated violinist was born. He was the only brother of Adelina Patti (Marchioness de Caux), of Carlotta Patti, and of Amelia Patti Strakosch. The deceased, in his twentieth year, had attained such proficiency in the use of his favourite instrument, the violin, that he led the orchestra at the Varieties Theatre, New Orleans. He had been connected with other first-class theatres in the same capacity. When quite young he married Effie Germon; but a few years after they were divorced. In New York he won success as the musical director of the Grand Opera-house and conductor of the concerts of the Ninth Regiment Band, and while so employed he married Miss Nully Pieris, which act estranged him from the love and sympathy of his sisters. He went to St. Louis to direct the orchestra of the Wakefield Operahouse, but that theatre soon failed, and he then gave a few concerts in surrounding towns with but little success. He became pecuniarily involved, and, at the time of his demise, was without means. The generosity of his friends had to be depended on for the proper honouring of his remains. The funeral took place on the 18th, from St. Bonaventura's Church. The orchestra of Theo. Habelman's Apollo Theatre kindly volunteered to assist in the funeral services of the departed musician, and, under the leadership of Mr. Schraum, assisted by Mr. La Fontain, Mr. Habelman, Mr. Herrmann, and Mr. Schuler, furnished the music for the burial service. Mr. Charles Kunkel also assisted, playing the "Kyrie Eleison." Only a few friends gathered to do homage to the deceased. His widow is fulfilling an engagement at Deagles' Varieties in that city; and, notwithstanding the distaste of relatives, he cherished her with seemingly true affection."

WAIFS.

In some of our theatres, thanks to "vaporisers" and other inventions of the perfumers, we are able to gratify our noses at the same time that we tickle our ears and please our eyes. A considerable advance, however, on the art of Rimmel has been attained in the neighbouring star-capital of Montalluyah, which leaves our poor perfumed programmes and scent-raisers in the auditorium far behind. If we may believe the author of Another World, they have a very superior sort of harp up in Montalluyah which exhales perfumed symphonies, or symphonic perfumes, whichever the reader prefers. "Around its framework most elegant and tasteful ornaments are executed with the minutest perfection—small birds of variegated plumage, perched on graceful foliage of green enamel, with flowers in their natural colours so executed as closely to resemble nature. The birds, flowers, and foliage are connected with the chords of the harp, and conceal from view small vases or reservoirs set in the framework of the instrument. From these with every touch of the chords a beautiful fragrance is exhaled, the force and delicacy of which depends on the more powerful or gentler strains produced from the instrument. The instant the player strikes the chords the little birds open their wings, the flowers quiver in gentle action, and then from the vases are thrown off jets of perfume. The more strongly the chords are touched the more powerfully does the fragrance play around. In tender passages the perfume gradually dies away, till it becomes as faint as to be appreciated only by the most delicate organisations. The result, however, is that the sense is gratified, the heart touched, and the whole soul elevated." Whether the Montalluyans prefer the sniff pianissimo to the smell forte, or vice versâ, is not stated; but we imagine a vast range must open out to the writers of the scent-symphonies and nose-concertos up there.—The Orchestra.

Signor Piatti has lately been playing with great success at Nantes.

Prince Arthur returned to London on Tuesday afternoon from Vienna.

M. Gounod's benefit concert, at St. James's Hall, is to take place on Saturday, the 31st inst.

Herr Pauer will give his "Historical Concert" on Monday next, at the Hanover Square Rooms.

A grand performance of military bands will regale the ears of the Shah of Persia at Kensington Gore.

Signor Foli has signed an engagement for the Italian Operas at St. Petersburg and Moscow for the ensuing season.

The Art Hall of the Vienna Exhibition has been opened, and the collection it contains of English pictures is greatly admired. In visiting the hall the Emperor spoke in very complimentary terms of the patriotism and self-denial of the gentlemen who, at some risk, had sent these valuable works so far.

Miss Helen Hogarth (Mrs. Roney), announces her annual concert for Thursday next, at the Hanover Square Rooms, when she is to be assisted, as usual, by some of the most favourite vocal and instrumental artists of the day.

Messrs. Frederick Iliffe (Kibworth, near Leicester); James Taylor (organist to the University and New College), New College; Walter Parratt (organist, Magdalen College), Magdalen College; and Frederick William Pacey (Bolton-le-Moors), St. Mary Hall, have taken their degrees as Bachelors of Music at Oxford.

Mr. Frederick Penna, we are informed, is about to give a lecture in St. George's Hall, on the character of Elijah, as depicted by Mendelssohn, in his superb oratorio, with introductory and incidental remarks upon "musical portraiture"—including vocal and instrumental illustrations. Nothing could be more interesting.

A London correspondent of the Liverpool Porcupine says:—

"The festival of the choirs at the Crystal Palace in July next is exciting considerable interest. It greatly delights me, as a 'Dicky Sam,' to hear of the efforts which are being made in Liverpool to ensure a proper representation of the town at the national competition. Your esteemed Mayor and others who have initiated, and are actively engaged in carrying out, the work, deserve substantial support. You will have the opportunity of hearing rehearsals, I presume, before the Liverpool choir starts for the Palace, and I will be greatly disappointed if 'the good old town' does not carry off honours."

We have often shown up the truly Christian sentiments of Christians, but here is the climax, taken from the very pious Church Herald:—

"Mr. J. Stuart Mill, who has just gone to his account, would have been a remarkable writer of English if his innate self-consciousness and abounding self-confidence had not made him a notorious literary prig. His 'philosophy,' so-called, was thoroughly anti-christian; his sentiments daringly mischievous and outrageously wild. As a member of Parliament he was a signal failure, and his insolence too, and contempt for, the great Conservative party was well known. His death is no loss to anybody, for he was a rank but amiable infidel, and a most dangerous person. The sooner those 'lights of thought' who agree with him go to the same place the better will it be for both the Church and State. We can well spare the whole crew of them, and shall hear of their departure, whether one by one, or in a body, with calm satisfaction."

Madame Adelina Patti.—Madame Patti narrowly escaped a serious accident on the evening of Monday last, at the Royal Italian Opera. The performance was Dinorah, in which, at the close of the second act, the heroine is supposed to cross a bridge, which breaks down. In stage language, this part is "doubled," and the drop is made by a super disguised as Dinorah. A good deal of changing takes place, and Madame Patti, making room for others, leant against a screen, which gave way, and her right foot slipped through a small gap in the platform nearly up to the hip-joint. She fell backwards, and it was some seconds before she could be extricated. She was carried in a state of insensibility to her room, where she was seen by Mr. Lennox Browne, in professional attendance on the stage. Though somewhat severely bruised and shaken, Madame Patti had sustained no serious injury, and, with characteristic courage, as soon as she came to herself, she dressed for the next act, and begged that the accident might pass unnoticed. She played her part to the close of the opera with her accustomed animation and effect; and none could have guessed that the fair Dinorah's recovery from her swoon, after her rescue by Hoel, had received so realistic an interpretation behind the scenes.—The Lancet.

Through the advertising columns of the Church Times, the public is informed that "a priest of the Church of England" is in need of "two strong, active girls, one as under house and kitchenmaid, the other as under nurse. They must each possess a good full round soprano voice, have correct ears, and, if possible, know something of music. His reverence is surely very particular, and just a trifle inconsistent—at least, so it appears to me, who, if my future happiness depended upon my present deeds in music, would not be quite so cheerful as, thank Providence, circumstances leave me at present. I learn on the highest lexicographic authority, that "soprano is the supreme or highest vocal part in music;" yet these two strong, active girls must, "if possible, know something of music." What does it mean, I wonder? Are the domestic commands of the rectory given and answered like the Cantoris and Decani song in the cathedrals? In a nurse, a "full round soprano" might be useful as a soporific for the infants; but how can it be expected that a young lady with the knowledge of the "supreme or highest part in vocal music" will so far descend the scale as to wash up dishes and scrub floors? Still, in publishing his scheme for combining high art with low work, the reverend advertiser needn't have made himself offensive. He talks about having "correct ears!" Are they to be as long as his own? If so, I am afraid he will not get any biped to suit him; and the only likely quadruped is very uncertain in his performances, and, so far as I can judge, not a good soprano.—Figaro.

Sir Julius Benedict's overture to Macbeth will shortly be performed at the daily orchestral concerts in the Albert Hall.

A very fashionable concert, under royal and distinguished patronage, took place at Dudley House on the 9th of May, under the direction of Herr Schuberth, for the Home for Daily Unemployed and Necessitous Governesses. All the artists kindly gave their valuable services on the occasion, and we trust a handsome sum was realised.

Miss Purdy, the only English artist who sang at the concert given at St. James's Hall, for the benefit of Mdlle. Ciabatta, was a pupil of the late Signor Ciabatta. The song Miss Purdy gave on the occasion was, we are informed, the last one taught her by her accomplished master, and her singing elicited for it a unanimous recall. The hall, our readers will be glad to hear, was well filled.

There was quite a rush at three o'clock, on Saturday, from the Flower Show to the Opera Theatre. It had been announced that once, and once only, the unmutilated text of Happy Land was to be given at the Crystal Palace; and the result was an unprecedented demand for reserved seats. The highest regular price for these preferential positions was only half-a-crown; but shortly before three o'clock a pound a piece was freely offered, and no takers. Selene, the Queen of the Fairies, was, as usual, magnificently looked and played by Miss Helen Barry, and the whole troop of Kensington fays were as charming as usual; Messrs. Ethais, Phyllon, and Lutin gave all the dialogue which the authors had originally set down for them; but the special "make-up" being absent, there was, as a consequence, a total absence of personal sting or malice. The majority of the short jokes went off very well, but the larger speeches, laden as they were with political allusions, hung fire a good deal; and to the majority of the Sydenham audience the last grand "situation" seemed to be rather unintelligible. However, taken altogether, the piece was decidedly a success; it attracted the most crowded audience ever assembled within the Opera Theatre. The miscellaneous vocal and instrumental concert with which the day's entertainments terminated was by no means the least attractive item in the programme. The united bands, under the direction of Mr. Manns, went splendidly; and that gentleman's own brilliant polka, "Minnie," the main burthen of which fell upon Mr. Wilmore, with his cornet obbligato, literally "brought down the house."

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From the "Literary World.")

The fact of a plurality of worlds has been so generally maintained by modern astronomers, that it almost takes its place among the truths commonly accepted by the large body of the educated; and that the planets of our solar sphere are inhabited is a pre-supposition, which is all but universally admitted by men of science, whatever be their creed, or their philosophy. A fragmentary account of some of the ways peculiar to the inhabitants of one of these "star-worlds," and of their moral and intellectual condition, is supposed to be presented in the singular volume entitled Another World; and the reader is gravely informed that the account is derived, not from the imagination, but by an "actual knowledge of the star," though how so extraordinary an experience was acquired is not—for the present, at least—to be revealed. A want of faith on the part of the reader is, therefore, naturally anticipated by the editor, who, for manifest reasons, disclaims all pretensions to the authorship of these communications, to the practical value of which he calls most especial attention, convinced, as he is, that they are replete with instruction to terrestrial mankind. The planet to which the "fragments" refer not only belongs, we are told, to the same solar system as our own, but also presents similar physical aspects. In it, as here, are to be found land and water, mountains, rivers, seas, lakes, hills, valleys, ravines, cataracts, alternating with each other; though, in consequence of more potent electrical agencies, the contrasts between these various objects are frequently abrupt and decided to a degree to which we can here offer no comparison. The people are not only human, but constituents of a highly-civilised and polished society. Their notions of good and evil, of happiness and misery, correspond with ours, and though they employ different means, the objects they pursue are identical with those sought by terrestrial philanthropists. Health, education, marriage, the removal of disease, the prevention of madness and of crime, the acts of government, the regulation of amusement, the efficient employment of physical forces—themes so often discussed among ourselves—appear equally to have occupied the attention of our planetary brethren, although in the result of our studies we differ not a little. Therefore we are besought not to receive this account as a story of "anthropophagi, or men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders," which can merely excite wonder, but as a record of actual men who, widely separated from us in the ocean of space, are beings with whom we can sympathise much more than with the inhabitants of the uncivilized portions of our own globe. This other world is, in fact, another earth, widely differing, indeed, from ours in its details, but still subjected to the same natural laws. "Its inhabitants," says the editor, "like devout persons here, look forward with reverent feelings towards the abode of the blest. To a purely spiritual or angelical region these fragments do not belong."

The name of "Montalluyah"—which more immediately belongs to the chief city in the planet—is "not incorrectly extended so as to include the entire sphere." This new world is not made up of separate countries and mutually independent States, like those of the earth; but, forming one kingdom, is governed by one supreme ruler, assisted by twelve kings inferior to him in rank and power. "The speaker in the 'fragments' (which may almost be said to take the form of an autobiography), was the son of one of the twelve kings, who, by his genius and worth, became 'Tootmanyoso,' or supreme ruler. In the planet his name is mentioned with even more reverence, than, by different peoples, is paid to that of Zoroaster, Solon, Lycurgus, or Alfred; but he has this peculiarity, that he does not fade, like many other great legislators, into mythical indistinctness, but is himself the exponent of his own polity." The editor states that he has reason to believe, though it cannot be affirmed with confidence, that Montalluyah is the world known to us as the planet Mars. Though there is the seeming objection that, whereas Mars is more distant than the earth from the sun, the sun appears much smaller, and its heat and light are less intense on the earth than in Montalluyah, which facts seem to indicate, not a longer, but a shorter distance of Montalluyah from the central luminary, and to point rather to Venus or Mercury than to Mars. On the other hand, according to the scientific theories of Montalluyah, the amount of light and heat received from the sun, and the aspect of that luminary, are governed, not as much by proximity as by the nature and electricity of the recipient planet, and its surrounding atmosphere.

Of all the physical agencies mentioned in the account, that of electricity is by far the most prominent. Both the knowledge and the manipulation of electricity have assumed in Montalluyah proportions far beyond those known to us. The electric fluid is there employed for the most various purposes: for locomotion, for lightening heavy bodies, for increasing the power of optical instruments, for the detection and eradication of the germs of disease, for increasing the efficiency of musical instruments—in a word for the advancement of the world in all that belongs to morality, science, and art.

Prior to the reign of Tootmanyoso, the people of Montalluyah had passed through various stages of civilization under the guidance of many wise and good rulers. Still the polity was defective, for the country remained subject to crime, misery, and disease. The proverb that "Prevention is better than cure," lies at the root of most of the reforms, both moral and physical, effected by the Tootmanyoso. The policy of prevention—that is, of destroying maladies of mind and body in the germ, before they had been allowed to spread their poison, is one of his leading principles. Under his influence the physicians of Montalluyah made it less their duty to cure than to prevent disease, therein differing widely from our practitioners, who are not usually called to exercise their skill until a malady has been developed, and has, perhaps, assumed serious aspects. Under his influence, likewise, it was thought better to diminish moral evil by extirpating faults in the child rather than by punishing crimes in the man. All the explanations and descriptions are given by Tootmanyoso himself. He thus pictures

THE STAR CITY.

"The power of the sun in my world is great, and the heat and light are excessive. The great heat, however, being tempered by cooling, refreshing winds and gushing waters, is, to our constitutions, generally agreeable, except at the period called the extreme season. The colours in the sky are in great variety, and of exceeding transparency and brightness, some parts presenting masses of gorgeous reds, golden colours, rich greens, and pinks of many shades. In vast mountainous and rocky regions is built our great city called Montalluyah, that is, 'God's own city.' What are called the External World Cities are built on the base, sides, and summits of many peaked mountains, rocks, hills, and promontories, girded, intersected, and undermined by the sea. The city is divided into 200 districts, each known by a name indicative of the situation. Before my reign each of these districts formed a separate city. Great, or rather petty jealousies existed between them, and much evil was the result. I decreed that all the districts should be called by one name, that the inhabitants of all should enjoy the same system of laws and government, the same customs and polity, and form—as it were, one large family. I did many things to cement the union. I executed, too, numerous great works, which assisted in promoting the growth of universal brotherhood. Henceforth I shall speak of all these cities as 'Montalluyah.' Palaces and edifices of various forms, their gilded spires and minarets, inlaid with many-coloured transparent stones, which sparkle in our brilliant sun, stand on undulating sinuous ridges, peaks and terraces, rising one above the other in endless and irregular succession. The houses are mostly curved, oval, or round. In Montalluyah straight lines are avoided. The houses are built principally with a white stone, mingled with a peculiar stone of a bright sky-blue colour, both stones repellent of heat. Gardens and verdure separate the houses one from the other. Most of the gardens are arranged in curvilinear lines, the houses being placed at the central point of the inner and outer curve alternately, so that each alternate house is on the outer centre of the garden curve. The undulating lines of terraces are broken by gigantic masses of rock of various colours, red, green, golden, white, blue, silver, brown, and variegated—rocks of carbuncle, lapis-lazuli, malachite, gold stone, and many coloured marbles. These rocks and undulations are intersected by ravines, rivers, inlets of the sea, lakes and cataracts, reflecting the many tints of the gorgeously coloured sky, and the rays of our vividly bright sun, filling our city, as it were, with aureoles of glory."

CHOOSING A HUSBAND.

The ladies appear to be the object of much solicitude, and to enjoy many privileges in Montalluyah. Woman is educated to qualify her for the position which nature intended her to hold as the companion and helpmate of man. She is instructed, though not to so great a degree, in many branches of art and science, cultivated by the stronger sex, the design being to enable her to appreciate the efforts of man, and to encourage and comfort him in his progress, but not to take his place. Beauty is regarded as a special gift from Heaven, which it behoves every woman to preserve and improve; and women in Montalluyah are scarcely less lovely in age than they were in youth. In every district a council of ladies who have passed through certain ordeals, and a council of elders, regulate all matters relating to marriage. Over each of these presides a man of a certain age and of spotless character, whose qualities, actions, and mode of life have been recorded from early youth. When the proper age for marriage arrives, the girl is for thirty-one evenings in succession placed in an assemblage of eighty-five young men, one of whom she is expected to choose; but however quickly her mind may be made up, she is not allowed to announce her decision till the thirty-first evening has arrived.

"The eighty-five young men are selected by the councils from those only who have declared their intention of marrying. Any man of the same rank as the lady, who is desirous to be one of the eighty-five, is generally nominated at once, and if the girl has any especial liking for one particular person, she is allowed to communicate the fact privately to one of the ladies of the council.

. Every contingency is well considered; besides, the regulations which govern every step connected with these meetings, and the sacred feeling with which the councils regard the delicate trust confided to them, prevent any inconvenience which might otherwise arise from their proceedings. At these meetings the girl wears a peculiar head-dress, with a star in front, to distinguish her from other ladies, who are allowed to be present, but who, however, are expected not to pay court to the gentlemen. It would have been unreasonable to require the exercise of so much self-denial under the old system, but an acquisition of the power of self-denial forms part of the training prescribed by my system of education, and is now ordinarily practised when needed. . . . Before a week has elapsed the maiden of the star has generally intimated by look who is likely to be the selected one. Sometimes, however, she is fickle, and when one, encouraged by her expressive glance, has paid her court, she will encourage another and another; for on these occasions she has full liberty of action."

On the thirty-first evening the maiden proclaims her choice by presenting the favoured one with an appropriate flower, and the chosen one leads his intended to a throne on a slightly raised dais. On the next evening the two meet and converse, and if, after mutual explanation, anything incongruous is found, either party is at liberty to object, and the marriage does not take place; but if three hours pass without objection, no further question can be raised. The two are then looked upon as betrothed, and, after a certain interval, the marriage takes place. If the maiden is unable to give the preference to any of the eighty-five aspirants, she is put back for another year, at the end of which another assembly of young men is called, the number being limited, however, to forty-five, and the evenings to twelve. Should the lady again fail to select, another and final assembly would be called for the following year, the number of gentlemen being reduced to twenty-one and the evenings to seven; and if the lady should still remain undecided, she must be content to enjoy single blessedness during the rest of her life. Tootmanyoso remembers only one case where the selection was postponed beyond the second year. Every woman, however high her rank, who elects to remain unmarried, is obliged to follow a calling adapted to her capacity and inclination.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Here I am once again on the banks of the Spree, or, more correctly speaking, about a couple of miles from that modest stream, which owes whatever immortality it possesses to the fact of its running through the capital of the Kaiser-King, Wilhelm. But my old quarters know me not. I have located myself in others which cost quite as much, and are infinitely more inconvenient; which are considerably higher, both as regards their proximity to the roof and to the rent I am expected to pay for them. I am not going to enter into a long disquisition on the awful dearness of everything here now, because other pens than mine have informed you over and over again that the pestilence of dearness has attacked Berlin just as it has attacked Paris, London, Vienna, and the other great cities of the earth. Nor am I about to investigate the cause, or causes, of this very undesirable increase in the cost of every necessary, and, what is still more cruel, of every superfluity of life; we may do without necessaries, but to be denied certain superfluities which long usage has rendered even as the breath of our nostrils, is indeed hard. Besides, although allowed considerable latitude in your columns, I am employed by you to write on musical matters, and not to exhaust my ink—and your patience—in lamenting over my personal affairs. I will, therefore, at once proceed to business, trusting you will pardon the querulous nature of this exordium; but when a man has to pay five thalers for what formerly stood him in only —— there, I am at it again. I will be off to the Royal Opera House without more ado.

I will commence with a little bit of statistics. The winter season, properly so called, concluded on the 1st instant. Between that date and the 16th August of the year previous, there were 170 representations, 160 being in German, and 10 in Italian. On the 160 German nights there were 37 different works contributed by 19 composers. Of these works Der Freischütz was given 10 times; Belmonte und Constanze and Stradella, 9 times each; Les Huguenots and Faust (here called Margarethe) 8 times each; Fidelio and La Dame Blanche, 7 times each; Tannhäuser, 6 times; Robert le Diable, Lohengrin, Le Lac des Fées, La Juive, Il Barbiere, Joseph, and Czaar und Zimmermann, 5 times each; Die Zauberflöte, Le Nozze di Figaro, Le Prophète, L'Africaine, Le Maçon, and Das Nachtlager in Granada, 4 times each; Orpheus, Don Pasquale, Der fliegende Holländer, La Muette de Portici, Un Ballo in Maschera, Il Trovatore, Mignon, and Hamlet, 3 times each; Armide, Oberon, Rienzi, Medea, Hermione, and Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, twice each; and Iphigenia in Aulis and Les Deux Journées, once each. Thus Gluck was represented by 3 works on 6 evenings; Beethoven by 1 work on 7 evenings; Mozart by 4 works on 20 evenings; Weber by 2 works on 12 evenings; Cherubini by 2 works on 3 evenings; Meyerbeer by 4 works on 21 evenings; Wagner by 4 works on 16 evenings; Méhul by 1 work on 5 evenings; Auber by 3 works on 11 evenings; Boieldieu by 1 work on 7 evenings; Halévy by 1 work on 5 evenings; Gounod by 2 works on 10 evenings; Ambroise Thomas by 2 works on 6 evenings; Rossini by 1 work on 5 evenings; Verdi by 2 works on 6 evenings; Kreutzer by 1 work on 4 evenings; Lortzing by 1 work on 5 evenings; Flotow by 1 work on 9 evenings; and Bruch by 1 work on 2 evenings. The Italian company—which was that under the management of Signor Pollini, and comprised Mdme. Artôt, Signori Padilla, Bossi, and Vidal—played Don Pasquale, Il Barbiere, L'Elisire, and Un Ballo in Maschera, twice each; and Otello and Rigoletto once each.

Madame Mallinger is still one of the leading members of the company, and, though she may not hold undisputed sway over the public, like some of her fair rivals, there is no denying that one finds many here who greatly admire her talent. In fact, I may say that their name is legion; for may not the number in a legion vary as much as the number in a regiment? She made her rentrée on the 8th March, the character selected being that of the heroine in M. Gounod's Faust. I was not present on the occasion, but I am informed by a friend, that her reception was very cordial, and must have made her rejoice at having quitted St. Petersburgh, which she found aught but a bed of roses, and whither probably she would show no extraordinary eagerness to return, even were she offered an engagement. Of course, I cannot say for certain, but I do not consider it probable that she entertains the slightest wish to revisit the capital of the Czar. After her re-appearance in Faust, she worked steadily through the season, until she took her leave for a time, the opera being M. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, on the 29th April. When I say she worked steadily through the season, I must not omit to state that there was one break, when the state of her health compelled her to take a little rest. Another lady who left in April, but for good, is Mdlle. Brandt, who had been a member of the company for some years, and whose voice was as fruitful a source of diversity of opinion among experts as was the celebrated shield, gold on one side and silver on the other, for our old acquaintances, the two knights. Some said it was a soprano; others asserted it to be a mezzo-soprano; while others stoutly maintained it was a contralto. The lady herself appeared to consider it to be all three, for she sang a strange range of characters, including Donna Anna, Fidelio, and Eglantine, Azucena, Fides, and Ortrud. Why she leaves, I do not know, but I believe it is at her own wish, and to the regret of the management.

Among the very few novelties produced since I last addressed you, that which, perhaps, excited the largest amount of curiosity was the Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas. To use a favourite expression with certain liners on the English press, public expectation was on tip-toe—a very painful position, I should say, for any person or persons, unless trained thereto like a ballet-girl, if they persisted in it for any time. Hamlet was well received on the first night. The principal parts, Hamlet and Ophelia, were well sustained by Herr Betz and Mdlle. Grossi respectively; the scenery was very beautiful and appropriate; the ballet, invented by Herr Taglioni, was effective; and the stage-business testified to great thought on the part of the stage-manager, and to a proper number of rehearsals. Some of the papers were very favourable in their opinions, and most of them exceedingly fair and moderate even when not favourable. Still I do not think Hamlet will eventually draw money to the treasury, or become a stock piece. Critics acknowledge freely enough that the music is that of an experienced musician who knows what he is about; but they deny its inspiration; the spark of genius, they say, is wanting. The pieces most liked were the duet between Hamlet and Ophelia in the first act; the scene with the Ghost; the ballet music, and the mad scene. But there is one thing the public loudly protest against, and that is the manner in which MM. Carré and Barbier have transformed and mutilated Shakespere's great tragedy. In Paris this did not, of course, matter; for, as a rule, Frenchmen are at the present day as incapable of appreciating our immortal dramatist as they were in the time of M. de Voltaire; but the case is different in Germany. In Germany, Shakespere is as much a household word as he is in England; German scholars are as well acquainted with his beauties as English scholars; and even the general public are no strangers to them, thanks to the marvellous translations they possess. It is not surprising, therefore, that the book of MM. Carré and Barbier has been pronounced absurd, childish, and even beneath contempt.

The next novelty—but not this season—will be Verdi's Aida, Madame Mallinger playing the part of the heroine. And with this item of news, I beg to say, as I have so often said before in these columns,

VALE.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

A concert of vocal and instrumental music was given on the evening of the 23rd inst., in this magnificent building on behalf of the Royal National Hospital, at Ventnor, for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest. It was the fourth and last of the "private evening concerts" (why so called, since the public have always attended them, it is not easy to explain) for the present season, and, on the whole, in an artistic sense, perhaps the most successful of the series. There was a brilliant and fashionable audience, although we should gladly have seen the hall more fully attended on such an occasion. Nevertheless, we have reason to hope that the excellent charity which does honour to the Isle of Wight will benefit considerably by the result.

About the Royal Albert Amateur Orchestral Society, and its objects, we spoke in our notice of its first "Private Evening Concert," not very long ago. His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, we need scarcely repeat, is not only the President, but takes his place among the principal violins, playing off the same desk as Mr. H. Enthoven, the excellent leader, or "chef d'attaque." He did so the other night, and was the observed of all observers in the midst of a band of instrumentalists some 200 in number, conducted by Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, whose name is a guarantee of competence. The programme was an attractive one, and judiciously made out with regard to contrast and variety. It began with Rossini's brilliant overture to La Gazza Ladra, the general execution of which, and even still more that of Auber's prelude to his Chinese opera, Le Cheval de Bronze, proved that our amateurs are really progressing. In the overture to the Minnesinger, one of the most ingenious and stirring orchestral works of Sir Julius Benedict, the performance of which was conducted by the master himself, who was welcomed as he deserved, the amateur players, allowing for some occasionally trying passages, showed equal aptitude and spirit. The last thing set down for them was the popular march from Sir Michael Costa's Eli.

One single incident, or non-incident, created general disappointment. It had been rumoured, and, indeed, if we are not mistaken, privately announced, that the Duke of Edinburgh was to play a solo on the violin, or, at least, to take a violin obbligato part in the "Ave Maria" which M. Gounod has constructed upon the first prelude in J. S. Bach's "48 Preludes and Fugues." His Royal Highness, however, did neither; contenting himself to associate with the rest of the orchestra, like any ordinary fiddler. In revenge, the "Ave Maria," arranged for soprano, organ (Dr. Stainer, of St. Paul's), pianoforte (Mr. G. F. Bambridge), and full orchestra, was so effectively given as to obtain an encore. The solo was intrusted to the Viscountess Folkestone, a lady who, while professedly an amateur, is evidently an accomplished mistress of her art. Her voice, though (as far as the vast proportions of Albert Hall would allow us to judge) not powerful, is of extremely agreeable quality, and her method of producing it is of the purest and most natural. Her intonation is invariably correct, and her "mezza voce" perfect. In fact, M. Gounod himself could hardly have been otherwise than satisfied with her delivery of his graceful melody. In other instances—for example, "Ti prego," Curschman's familiar trio, in which she was associated with Mdlle. de Driesen (contralto) and Mr. Lionel Benson (tenor); "Sweet spirit, hear my prayer," from Vincent Wallace's Lurline, for which, being again encored, she substituted "Home sweet home;" and the quartet from Niedermayer's Marie Stuart (with Mdlle. de Driesen, Messrs. Benson and Hardy), the Vicountess displayed the same excellent qualities. Among the vocal pieces worthy special mention was Mr. Arthur Sullivan's "Looking back," a song as engaging as it is plaintive, given with such genuine feeling by Mdlle. de Driesen that she was compelled to repeat it. Compositions by Balfe, Handel, Virginia Gabriel, &c., were contributed by the same lady, Messrs. Lionel Benson and J. S. Hardy; but we cannot enter into further particulars. A solo on the great organ (minuet and variations by Handel), finely played by Dr. Stainer, being encored, a shorter solo was substituted by that thoroughly trained artist. A serenade by Volkmann, for stringed instruments, in four movements, the first of which (allegro moderato) is graceful and melodious, while the second, third, and fourth are of small value, completed the list of the instrumental morceau.

The vocal solos without orchestra were, with a single exception, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Sullivan, the exception being a lively air, "He that loves a rosy cheek," sung by Mr Hardy, and composed by Mr. Lionel Benson, who himself took charge of it. It was nearly half-past 11 before the concert was over; and the National Anthem had yet to come.

THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The opening of the Dublin Exhibition, on Wednesday the 14th inst., gave occasion for the performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie, with a chorus and band of nearly five hundred performers. The vast assemblage of rank and fashion which graced the beautiful building on the occasion were attracted to the concert-hall long before the hour appointed, hearing that the distinguished artists, Mdlle. Alvsleben, Miss Edith Wynne, and Mdlle. Demeric Lablache were to sing the leading parts. A more faithful rendering of this great work has rarely been heard in Dublin, whether we consider the numbers engaged in its performance, or the excellence of the artists.

The orchestra was ably led by Mr. R. M. Levey; and the conductor, Mr. G. V. Lee, proved himself as careful and skilful as he had previously shown himself in training the chorus. Miss Emilie Glover and Mrs. Mackey presided at the harps, the effect of which added much to the local colouring of the work, particularly in the introductory movement, and in the chorus, "Blessed are they." The march and final choruses wound up the performance effectively.

In the evening there was a concert, with organ recital by Mr. Gater. The artists were the same as in the morning, with the addition of Mr. Vernon Rigby and Signor Foli. The same party gave a concert on Saturday evening. Athalie is announced for repetition.

Stanzas for Music.

I dreamt that I passed thro' Fairy Land,
My Love and I on our way,
From this dull earth to a better sphere,
And the Fairies bade us stay.

We lingered awhile in that bright land,
My love and I were so gay,
And almost forgot while tarrying there,
We were only on our way.

The fairies all sang from morn till night,
So happy and blithesome they,
With purest joy, and no evil thing,
E'er shadow'd their cloudless day.

'Twas too bright to last, for naught so chaste,
Save in Heav'n is found, I deem,
And this was true, for when I awoke,
I saw it was all a dream!—M. A. BAIKES.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(Communicated.)

At a meeting of the General Committee, held at Birmingham on Saturday, Mr. Beale in the chair, the following outline scheme of the performances to be given in the Birmingham Town-hall on the four days ending the 29th of August next was submitted by the orchestral steward, Mr. Richard Peyton, jun., and approved:—Tuesday morning, Elijah; evening, a new cantata, Fridolin, by Signor Randegger, and a miscellaneous selection. Wednesday morning, Mr. Arthur Sullivan's new oratorio, The Light of the World; evening, a miscellaneous concert, including a short composition by Rossini and a symphony by Beethoven. Thursday morning, the Messiah; evening, a new cantata, The Lord of Burleigh, by Signor Schira, and miscellaneous selection. Friday morning Spohr's cantata, God, Thou art great; Haydn's Imperial Mass; and a new short choral work by Rossini. The second part will comprise a double chorus by Rossini, also new, and a selection of double choruses from Israel in Egypt. Friday evening, Judas Maccabeus. The whole of the choruses of Signor Schira's cantata, The Lord of Burleigh, the subject of which is taken from the Laureate's poem, and most of those comprised in Signor Randegger's cantata, Fridolin, have been in active rehearsal for some time past. Four short pieces, three sacred and one secular, by Rossini, which are entirely new to the British public, are comprised in the programme. Two of those, from among the composer's unpublished posthumous works, will be heard for the first time in public. Most of the leading oratorio artists of the day have already signed engagements; and negotiations have been opened with other singers of note. Sir Michael Costa retains his post as conductor of the Festival.

MDLLE. CIABATTA.

The death of Signor Ciabatta, the respected vocalist, was the occasion of a concert being given last Monday morning week, at St. James's Hall, by his daughter, Mdlle. Ciabatta, who, by the sad bereavement that has befallen her, has, unhappily, experienced a considerable reverse of fortune. The concert was got up at the instance of Madame Puzzi, a warm friend of the deceased artist, and to whose kindly influence the presence of several of the most distinguished singers belonging to Her Majesty's Opera was, no doubt, chiefly to be attributed. Signor Ciabatta, some years ago, when in a better state of health than it was his lot subsequently to enjoy, was occasionally heard in the concert-room, where, as a barytone of some pretension, he was listened to with pleasure; but of late his professional exertions were confined to teaching, for which his accomplishments as a musician, and his long experience in such labours eminently qualified him. The programme of Monday was, of course, not distinguished by any features of novelty, but it was, nevertheless, very good of its kind, and afforded the friends and patrons of Mdlle. Ciabatta an opportunity of hearing a succession of operatic vocalities, sung as only the choicest singers of the age could be expected to sing them, and of the incessant repetition of which the public seems never destined to be weary. Mdlle. Tietjens, who was in excellent voice, was one of the queens of the day, and sang Pacini's "Il soave e bel contento," which she decorated in her own superlatively adroit and ingenious manner, and Sullivan's pathetic song, "Gninevère." Mdme. Trebelli was her chief associate, and how attractively that gifted contralto sings Gounod's serenade, "Quand tu chantes bercée," and Offenbach's chanson, "C'est l'Espagne," from Les Bavards, is well-known to most people. Upon this occasion she delivered them with all her best skill, and in the latter was loudly encored. In the course of the concert these two popular artists sang, minus the recitative, the duet from Semiramide, "Giorno d'orrore," and this too challenged the prescriptive fiat of repetition. Besides Tietjens and Trebelli, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Alvina Valleria, and Mdlle. Marie Roze, were in commission, the first being encored in the "Ombre légère," from Dinorah, of which she is one of the most satisfactory of executants, the second giving Meyerbeer's "Robert, toi que j'aime"—hardly so exemplary a performance—and the third, a new and clever song by Cowen, called "Marie," in which she was accompanied by the composer. The other Italian singers were Signor Gardoni, whose version of Gordigiani's "Impossible" was unimpeachable; Signor Medini, whose capital voice shone conspicuously in Donizetti's aria "Vieni, la mia vendetta;" Signor Agnesi, who gave a spirited reading of Mozart's "Non più andrai"; Signor Cantoni, who was moderately successful in the romanza from Maria di Rohan, "Alma soave e cara"; Signor Fancelli, who revealed some good singing in Flotow's "M'appari"; and Signor Borella, whose delivery of the diverting aria buffa of De Giosa, "O che freddo," overflowed not only with humour but with the utmost technical excellence as a display of vocalization. The substitution of Cimarosa's "Se fiato" for a duet by Ricci, was also another field in which Borella, aided by Agnesi, disported himself admirably. The native element consisted of Miss Purdy and Mr. Trelawny Cobham. The former young artist, whose improvement is making itself distinctly manifest, sang the somewhat sombre aria of Stradella, "O del mio ardor," with commendable taste and purity of expression—facts which the audience did not fail to recognize; and the latter contributed the "Once again," of Sullivan, which, hackneyed as it is becoming, never fails to please. The remainder of the programme included a well known specimen or two of operatic part singing, and solos on the pianoforte and violoncello by Signors Tito Mattei and Paque: and the duties of conducting were vested in the skilled hands of Signors Vera, Pinsuti, and Ganz. The hall was well filled, and hence it may be presumed that the objects for which the concert was given were effectively answered.

PAULINE LUCCA IN CHICAGO.

The Chicagonesians are in raptures with Germany and England's special favourite, Pauline Lucca. Our "exchanges" give us no end of details of the brilliant success she has achieved. To reproduce them all would require an entire number of the Musical World. This we cannot afford; but we are only too glad to give some extracts. Listen to the Chicago Tribune of May 11th:—

"A lively scene, not down on the programme, occurred at the matinée yesterday. The opera was The Daughter of the Regiment, with Mdme. Lucca as Maria. Her presentment of the part worked up the audience to an unusual degree of enthusiasm. Her singing of the German ballad of 'Mein Leib,' by Gumbert, and the English 'Home, Sweet Home,' secured round after round of rapturous applause, and the stage was covered with flowers showered upon the prima donna. Before the noise had subsided, Mr. Louis Wahl, one of Chicago's most prominent German citizens, stepped on the stage, and in a brief and exceedingly appropriate speech, presented Mdme. Lucca with a handsome diamond cross in the name of the citizens of Chicago, as a token not only of their appreciation of her eminent genius, but also of the personal knowledge of many of the donors of her good heart. Mdme. Lucca received the box containing the cross, pressed it to her bosom, and stepped to the front to make her acknowledgments. It was some moments before she could give expression to her thoughts. She then told simply that she was overwhelmed with the kindness exhibited to her in Chicago, that her heart was full of gratitude, and that she looked forward with pleasure to the time when she should return. She was very much affected, and brushed away the tears as she turned towards the piano, after wishing 'Prosperity to Chicago.' The situation was becoming seriously pathetic when Ronconi, who took the part of the Sergeant, quickly relieved it by picking up a little bouquet, and presenting it to Mdme. Lucca on his own account, with a flourish that made her break out in a mirthful laugh, which the house took up. The opera then proceeded with new spirit, and Mdme. Lucca was repeatedly called out at the dropping of the curtain. The lady will take away with her the most pleasant recollections of her Chicago friends."

The Inter-Ocean Journal speaks as follows about the final operatic performance of the season in Chicago:—

"The opera season of five performances of Italian opera at McVickers, under the direction of Mr. Maretzek, closed yesterday afternoon with The Daughter of the Regiment, with Madame Lucca in the title rôle. The season has been a very decided success, artistically and pecuniarily. The audiences have been large, and on several occasions the house was uncomfortably crowded. The operas have been Faust, with Madame Lucca; Martha, with Miss Kellogg; Mignon and Don Giovanni, with both prime donne; and The Daughter of the Regiment, with Madame Lucca. The most serious objection to the season was that, with but one exception, no opera was presented in which Madame Lucca had not already appeared before the Chicago public. L'Africaine, The Huguenots, and Der Freischütz hold a prominent place in this lady's repertory, and it would have been gratifying if one or more of them had been presented. The main reason why this was not the case is to be found in Mr. Maretzek's desire that the accessories of his operas should be complete and satisfactory, and he feared that this was impossible in the present season. Fortunately, the pleasure of seeing Madame Lucca in a wide range of operas is only deferred, and not lost. It is probable that she will return to Chicago some time during October. It is definitely arranged that Madame Lucca shall spend another year in America. Although the lady is announced in an extended list of operatic stars to appear in London during the summer season, she will not return to Europe. She will spend the summer months among the mountains in absolute rest, and resume, under Mr. Maretzek's management, in the fall season. Mr. Maretzek will retain M. Jamet and Signor Vizzani in his company, and will add a new tenor, a new prima donna, and a new contralto, thus strengthening his organization for the coming season. Madame Lucca has made a deep impression on the Chicago musical public, which will welcome her back at all times with a glad and enthusiastic reception."

JAPAN.—It report be true, a company of capitalists has been formed for the purpose of erecting an Italian operahouse at Yeddo.

THE CHARITY CHILDREN IN ST. PAUL'S.

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

SIR,—One of the most popular services in any Cathedral in England was—I wish I could say is—the annual gathering of the parochial school children from all the parishes of London. For some reason unknown to the public, the present Dean, or the gentleman who controls and manages the Cathedral services, has put a stop to this service. It was not a very magnificent service; it was destitute of all pomp; it did not offer the highest musical treat to professional musicians; it was not even the highest idea of Anglican worship; but it was very interesting to the public, who, once in a year, saw the children of their poor neighbours in their new school dress (some of them far prettier than the costly costume with which most well-to-do young women bedizen themselves now-a-days), with bouquets in their hands, and the parish clergyman and the parish beadle and the chief parishioners leading them. And it was still more interesting and very touching to those inside the Cathedral who heard the children sing, with their best voices, their Hosannas under the great dome of our chief national church; and, moreover, it made thousands take an interest in the schools which were under the fostering care of the national Church; and many who had never been inside a cathedral, or even seen a Dean, blessed the children as they passed on their way to sing their annual song of thanksgiving, and felt, indeed, that many charges against the Church were well answered when they had this annual evidence before their eyes of the Church's work. Thousands of good, hard-working fellows, as they passed them in the streets, and saw the cabs, omnibuses, and carts all waiting for the children, as loyally as if a royal procession were passing, were reminded of the existence of a cathedral which belonged to the people of London, and of a national Church itself. It is not much that the cathedral bodies do to make the influence of their beautiful churches felt by the "common people," and in this great "province covered with houses" the relative influence of even so magnificent a church as St. Paul's is very little—so little, indeed, that some good reason must be given for the abandonment of anything that makes that little more.

I have heard two reasons assigned for giving up these services—1. That they cost more than they produced, which I cannot believe, as there was generally a surplus to be divided among the schools. 2. That the voices of so many children made bad music; and that in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's nothing but the highest class of music should be heard. I hope this last excuse is not the true one, as I venture to think that, to a greater and better audience than the Dean and Chapter and even the best musicians who go to the church dedicated to that Apostle who, better than any other man, understood his Master's words about "worshipping God in spirit and in truth," the songs of the little street children in Jerusalem singing out their glad Hosannas were more acceptable than the choir of angels. The very stones of St. Paul's ought to cry out if the Dean and Chapter compel the little school children of London "to hold their peace." Faithfully yours,

SEPTIMUS HANSARD.

DRAMATIC IMPROBABILITY.

(To the Editor of the "Daily Telegraph.")

SIR,—I trust my motive in troubling you with this communication will not be misinterpreted, and that I shall not be considered thin-skinned if I point out, through the medium of your widely-spread and influential paper, to those critics who, in their remarks on my drama, Fine Feathers, have dwelt at length on the play's improbability, a few facts on the subject which may also possess some interest for the general as well as the theatrical reader.

Cibber's "Careless Husband" presents a case of gross improbability. A husband is discovered by his wife asleep under circumstances peculiarly calculated to arouse her indignation. She simply places a handkerchief over his face. Dr. Johnson was then a boy, but had he been old enough to have expressed an opinion, the great lexicographer would, no doubt, have scouted the lady's conduct as "outrageously improbable." He lived, however, to descant in laudatory terms upon the actual fact which occurred later on in his life, and Boswell records his sentiments.

The "improbability" of the clergymen's conduct at Vauxhall, in Fielding's Amelia (chapter 9), where he threatens the offender with personal chastisement, regretting that he has him not in a "proper place," where he "would strike a blow, and a pretty hard one, too," has been held up as a blot upon the novel. Such remarks from a clergyman, and such a clergyman, were out of all improbability. About twenty years after Fielding's death a certain Parson Bates had an altercation with a gentleman at Vauxhall, and the affair was fought out in the rooms of the fashionable bully, who substituted for his own proper person a muscular Irish footman. It is pleasant to find that the footman was thoroughly well thrashed by the parson. This highly improbable incident is recorded in Macaroni's Magazine.

Taking a leap from the days of Fielding to those of his great follower, Thackeray, may I remind your readers of the universal sneers with which the most improbable accident to a coach, with a will hidden in the bulging projection at the back, that changes the fortune of a family, was received by most critics. For such a writer as Thackeray to hide a will in the "sword-box" of a coach; to make the vehicle break down and defy probability by such illegitmate melo-dramatic means, was really asking too much of his readers. Within a year of the publication of the book a coach did break down, and a will was found in precisely the way described by the novelist, changing the fortunes of a family in the most improbable manner. The fact was recorded in the Times.

From Thackeray to Dickens is a natural step. The latter writer, it may be assumed, little knew, when he made Sam Weller tell the story of the obstinate muffin-eater, who blew out his brains on principle, when he could no longer blow himself out on muffins, that this ridiculous improbability had actually occurred. The true story is told in "Boswell's Life of Johnson." In a romance published over two hundred years ago, the maddest improbability occurs. Two lovers actually communicate by electric telegraph—magnet, letters, dial, complete. Addison translates this monstrous absurdity in No. 241 of his "Spectator," ridiculing it, as a matter of course. The original romance appears in "The Prolusions of Strada," a writer who died in 1649.

It is an "easy descent" from these great names to the humble writer who now addresses you, but, Sir, I may state that the improbable incident of the changed children, the production of the Doctor's notebook to settle the right of the true claimant to large estates, and other absurdities in my drama, are embodied in the instructions to counsel contained in a highly interesting, but of course utterly impossible, brief at present in my possession. I have many other improbable facts ready to record if necessary, and the word "claimant" seems in itself to suggest further remarks upon the subject; but I fear I have already trespassed too much upon your crowded columns. I have written this in no spirit of opposition to my critics, whose generous appreciation of my endeavours to amuse an audience I should indeed be ungrateful not to cordially acknowledge, but simply because I imagine a case may be often made out for even the most desperate dealers in "Improbability."—I am, Sir, obediently yours,

Garrick Club, May 15. HY. J. BYRON.

"ANOTHER WORLD."

(From "Public Opinion.")

This is a curious and remarkable volume, giving a description of the novel system of society existing in "the star city of Montalluyah." The inhabitants of this city are very peculiar, and their manners and customs, as described from the vivid imagination of "Hermes," are well worth studying. Of course the writer assures the reader that his work describes a state of affairs in actual existence—writers of this class of books always do; but it is fair to say that the present narrative is as plausible as such a wholly fictitious narrative can be. It is not only novel, but is also thoughtful and ingenious. Hermes' ideal world is well worth knowing; the arrangements are so fresh and diverting, and not a few so extremely beautiful, that one wishes they could be transplanted to this sorely afflicted world of dull reality. Sanitary laws are well kept in Montalluyah, while advanced science contributes in no slight degree to the prosperity of the highly-favoured race. The morals of the people are also looked after with particular care; and young ladies are preserved from ill-assorted marriages by a principle of selection which weeds out bad husbands. We are told something of the state of education and the fine arts in the star city; and there are several other subjects treated in an extremely clever and diverting style.

BY HERMES.

"A very curious book, very cleverly written. . . . Likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind."—Saturday Review.

"Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to this sublinary sphere as to those of another world. . . . Of his powers of narrative and expression there can be no doubt."—Morning Post.

"A romance of science. . . . Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."—Sunday Times.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1873.

MUSICAL taste may be defined as being that capacity by which we select the best in music, according to the most improved standard of the age in which we live. It may be further amplified and particularized into place, capacity, and occasion. What would be perfect taste at one time would be in bad keeping at another. How melancholy and chilling the silence that pervades the family circle when some beloved member of it has recently been removed by death! It is always hard work and harrowing to the feelings to sit down to music for the first time after such painful visitations. The first sound of the long-neglected instrument, as it sorrowfully responds to the trembling touch, falls strangely on the bereaved heart. The dashing song and the jovial hunting air may be correctly performed, but at such an hour of sadness they shock both taste and feeling. Some deep-toned and solemn strain, breathing resignation, is alone suitable for the first music after the loss of a friend. When we are called upon to worship God, good taste demands that all musical ornament connected with His praise shall be chastened by the severest criticism. Anything light or trivial ill becomes the occasion; and only that music is fitting which at once expresses and stimulates the adoration, reverence, and love due to the Supreme. In all musical matters good taste requires us to heed the conscientious scruples of those with whom we are brought in contact; and here we may censure a practice to which amateurs are sometimes addicted. If those to whom we refer happen to know how to inflict annoyance by means of the art they pretend to love, they will, if possible, contrive to do so. Let such a thing be far from us. There is vexation enough in the world. Good taste may also be viewed in its relation to capacity. Many a fine voice is lost in trying to execute music unsuited to its quality and register; and many a performer is set down as a poor player simply because he attempts that which is outside his capacity. Let people ascertain what their powers really are, and, having done so, confine themselves to the work for which nature intended them. There is plenty of music within the compass of ordinary powers, and there are plenty of songs for every kind of voice. Every bird to his own note the round world round. It is a law of nature that for everything there is a place and season; and his taste is simply vitiated who offends this canon of universal being.

From taste to expression is a short step. Expression is more than an affair of mechanism. It is the pouring forth of the soul through the medium of musical sounds. Musical compositions are of infinite degrees of value, but the feeling of the best, as of the worst, depends upon the executive artist. A man without deep feeling and strong passion can never be a great performer. Expression is the fire and mettle of the steed; taste is the hand that holds the reins. The one is the channel, the other the stream. The one is the gem, the other the lapidary. Setting aside the difference which must result from the varying state of human feeling, who has not been struck with the different impression which two artists will produce by the execution of the same piece? But in contrast with this is the no-effect made by some mere performing machine, who, if he ever had anything in him like passion and sentiment, has long since lost it in the jar and discord of life. He sits down to a composition which has made men weep a thousand times, but not a dimmed eye responds to his appeal. There is no flow of soul; and to hear even the noblest music thus interpreted is like gazing upon "fleshless bones and ribs," where there should be a beautiful human form.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE work done at both Opera-houses during the week just passed has been of a somewhat routine order, consisting mostly of repetitions. We are now passing through that period of every season which, though very active, presents the least interest to lovers of novelty. The "stars" have arrived, and their first business is to go the round of popular characters, repeating the process as often as may be needful till the promised novelties are ready. So, while Madame Patti awaits the production of Les Diamans de la Couronne, and Madame Nilsson awaits Il Talismano —or, at least, Mignon—we have them in familiar characters over and over again. The audience do not show the least disposition to complain because the new things are delayed. Indeed, it would appear as if they rather preferred old acquaintances. But this is characteristic of an opera audience, who hate the trouble of mastering a new plot, and of getting new melodies into their heads. Give them a familiar story and familiar themes, which necessitate no mental exertion of any kind, and they are happy. Of course, we except the gallery, and the very few amateurs who may be found elsewhere, from this statement; but the gallery is hardly in "the house," and the amateurs are too few for consideration. It is to be presumed that the novelties promised will, nevertheless, make their appearance:—Les Diamans de la Couronne and Moise at Covent Garden; and Balfe's posthumous work at Drury Lane. Should this be the case, the season may fairly put in a claim for distinction on the ground that it has not proved altogether barren of musical interest.

THE New York Arcadian has the following remarks upon the performance of one of those "lay figures" of the stage, who think that acting consists in a display of millinery, and spend five times the amount of their salary on overdressing their parts:—

"One of the rules which rhetoric lays down for the proper management of the personages in a drama, is that no character shall be made to leave the stage or to enter, without a definite purpose, appreciable to the spectator. Mrs. Abbott has applied this rule to her own advantage most relentlessly, for she never abandons the scene except for the very obvious purpose of changing her dress. In the course of four acts she manages to mount not less than five costumes, and probably the audience would have borne it with equanimity had she displayed fifteen instead. As the evening wore on, and more and more of the wardrobe was seen, the audience began to inspect the playbills more attentively, wondering how long the thing was going to last, and speculating at what act it would give signs of weakness and decay. We feel how triumphant it is to be able to add that Mrs. Abbott's costumary held out to the last, and that in the final act it was as heterogeneous as a dollar store, and as gorgeous as a gift enterprise. To throw metaphor aside, Mrs. Abbott's costumes were five in number, and among the most brilliant and expensive yet seen upon the New York stage. What that acting must have been which permits us to take refuge in these remarks, we leave the public to conjecture. An effort of this kind does not come within the domain of art."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

PRECOCIOUS talent—especially if it be musical talent—is a dangerous possession, because easily misemployed, and we are far from sure that any stimulus ought to be given to it by public applause. The history of art is full of examples which go to prove that the forcing of a prematurely-developed and finely-strung organisation almost inevitably produces mischief. We must not, therefore, be supposed to approve the exhibition of wonderful children when we record the success gained at the Beethoven Rooms, last Tuesday evening week, by two "infant pianists," the Misses Molyneux. These very young performers have remarkable talent, combined with remarkable memories; both gifts being strikingly shown in the course of a "recital," comprising selections from Bach, Handel, Benedict, and other masters. Their musical intelligence and feeling are of a high order, and, provided they have the careful and judicious training specially called for, the art may eventually possess in them exponents of high rank. A great responsibility rests upon the guardians of such clever children.—Daily Telegraph,

MR. AND MRS. R. BLAGROVE'S annual concert took place on Wednesday week, in the Beethoven Rooms, and attracted a very full audience. The programme was one of genuine interest, classical and popular selections being mixed with the good judgment necessary to please a crowd of miscellaneous hearers. A MS. quintet in D major, by Mr. E. Silas, led off, and was ably performed by Mrs. Blagrove (piano) Messrs. Dando (violin) Zerbini (viola), Daubert (violoncello), and R. Blagrove (concertina). We noticed this work when it was produced not long ago at one of M. Gounod's concerts, and need only say now that it is a work of distinguished merit. The effect of the concertina may have called forth a variety of opinions, but there could be no question at all as regards the skill of the performer. Mr. Blagrove is a perfect master of the instrument, and if anything could give the concertina classic rank it would be such playing as his. Mr. and Mrs. Blagrove (the latter one of our best native pianists) were heard together in Sydney Smith's brilliant Duo Concertante, on airs from Mirella; and Mr. Blagrove also played his own MS. fantasia, Recollections of Scotland, with admirable taste and skill. The lady's solos were an Impromptu by Chopin, and Stephen Heller's Transcription of Schubert's Truite, in both of which her remarkable ability received ample recognition. The concert-givers were assisted by the following vocalists:—Misses Matilda Scott, Abbie Whinnery, Atkins, and Isabella Westbrook.

THE ST. JOHN'S WOOD SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS gave a concert on Wednesday week, at their rooms, Lyndenhurst, St. John's Wood. Each executant wore a fancy dress. The first part opened with Sidney Smith's lively pianoforte duet, Gaieté de Cœur, well played by Misses E. Folley and Percival. The little Australian pianist, Miss A. L. Okey, in Wely's Noce du Village, and one or two other pieces, delighted all present. The song of "The Beacon," by Miss Piatti, was deservedly encored. Miss Phillips and Mdlle. Fonliere, in Balfe's duet, "She is fooling thee," were excellent. Miss Pritchard, in "The song of May," sang with taste. A Mr. Reynolds displayed a good tenor voice in "Alice, where art thou?" and Mesdames Lucy Parish, Auber, Edith and Ethel Shield, Emeline Thomas, Percival, Alice Mordaunt, Payter, Therese Hodson, Fonliere, Piatti, F. Lucombe, Courtenaye, Peters, with Messrs. John Barrow, M. Barlet, Guy Harrington, and C. Bell, contributed to the programme. Mr. G. Lansdowne Cottell and Mr. Charles Thorpe accompanied the vocal music.

MISS HELEN HOGARTH'S (Mrs. R. C. Roney) annual concert took place at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Tuesday last, before a crowded and fashionable audience, who listened with attention to a programme which the bénéficiaire put forth to gratify and conciliate the various tastes of her numerous friends and patrons. The concert commenced with Blangini's well-known duet, "Per valli per boschi," given by Miss Edith Holman-Andrews and Mr. Selwyn Graham. Miss Helen D'Alton displayed her voice to advantage in a new ballad by Signor Barri; Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Katherine Poyntz, Miss Minna Poole, Miss Jose Sherrington, Miss Abbie Whinnery, Mdlle Nita Gaetano, and Miss Susan Pyne, gratified the audience by their excellent interpretation of songs by Meyerbeer, Mozart, Zimmermann, Ward, Gounod, &c. The Misses Edith and Gertrude Holman-Andrews sang remarkably well Sir Julius Benedict's popular duet, "The ties of friendship" (accompanied by the composer), as did Miss Edith a song by Blumenthal, and Miss Gertrude gave the well-known Irish ballad, "Robin Adair" (accompanied by Mrs. Holman-Andrews), with unaffected simplicity, and gained the sympathies of the audience. Mr. Vernon Rigby sang "Salve dimora casta e pure" (Faust), in his usual excellent style. Mr. G. Weidge, who possesses a deep baritone voice, sang with effect Meyerbeer's "The Monk" (in German), and a song by Mr. L. Emanuel, "In England I was born." Signor Gardoni delighted everyone by his exquisite vocalization of Signor Badia's serenata, "Canto per te." He was in excellent voice, was beautifully accompanied by Sir Julius Benedict, and was called upon unanimously to repeat the song. Mr. Selwyn Graham, in Molique's "Soft blue eyes," gave evident proof of improvement. Miss Elizabeth Philp gave her own song, "Restored;" Mr. Raynham, Miss Alice Lee's "Parting;" and Miss Poyntz, Miss Kate Ward's "Watching". Miss Lila Hutton displayed brilliant execution in a waltz by Chopin; Signor Tito Mattei delighted all present by his performance of two of his brilliant solos, and Mr. Val Nicholson gave a violin solo by De Beriot with effect. Mr. Edward Howell played a solo on the violoncello to perfection. His beautiful tone and perfect execution were deservedly applauded with enthusiasm. Mr. John Thomas gave Parish Alvar's grand Study, "Il Mandolina," with his usual excellence, and the concert concluded with Balfe's trio, "Through the World," sung by Miss K. Poyntz, Messrs. Selwyn Graham, and G. Weidge. Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. L. Emanuel, and Mr. Hargitt accompanied, and Mrs. Holman-Andrews accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

The first of Mr. Otto Booth's concerts of chamber music was given in St. George's Hall on Thursday week, and attracted a fair audience. The programme, a good one, commenced with Haydn's quartet in D minor for two violins, viola, and violoncello, admirably executed by Messrs. Booth, Dando, Blagrove, and Pezze, and much applauded. Leonard's violin solo, Souvenir de Haydn, was capitally played by Mr. Otto Booth. The other instrumental pieces were Mendelssohn's trio in C minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Mozart's quartet in D (No. 7) for two violins, viola, and 'cello. The vocalist was Miss Purdy, who sang "O del mio dolce ardor" (Stradella), and F. Cowen's "Marguerite," and was much applauded after each. Mr. H. Parker was the conductor. The second concert is announced for Thursday evening, June 5.

Mdlle. Bondy, one of our most able and intelligent resident foreign pianists, gave her annual concert on Saturday last, at St. George's Hall, which was fully attended by her friends and patrons. The concert opened with a quartet in A minor, Op. 43, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, by Frederick Kiel, a composer whose name we do not remember often to have seen in the programmes of the present day. The quartet is a work of merit, and it received every justice from the executants, Mdlle. Bondy, Messrs. Joseph Ludwig, Zerbini, and Vieuxtemps. Mdlle. Bondy played, as solo, Beethoven's sonata in E flat, Op. 81, with true artistic feeling, obtaining great applause after each movement, and then gave consecutively, Bach's prelude and fugue in C sharp minor, Schumann's "Grillen," and Chopin's etude in G flat minor, proving herself an able executant in each piece, all so difficult, and so different in style and character. Mdlle. Bondy finished the concert with a brilliant performance of Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "Erl King," which was most enthusiastically and deservedly applauded. Herr Joseph Ludwig gave a violin solo (Brahms and Joachim) on Hungarian dances, which displayed his executive powers to advantage, and M. Vieuxtemps a solo on the violoncello, on an air by Donizetti. Mdlle. Bondy had, in the vocal portion of her programme, the services of Miss Arnim, a young German vocalist, who possesses a capital contralto voice, which she displayed to great advantage in Handel's song, "Son confusa Pastorella," Schumann's lieder "Sonnenschien," and "Ich grolle nicht." Miss Jessie Royd, in Lynette's song (Louisa Gray), and in a song by Mrs. Macfarren, was favourably received. Mr. A. Barth presided at the pianoforte.

Miss Eleanor Armstrong, a young vocalist who deserves to be oftener heard in public, gave her annual concert at St. George's Hall, on Tuesday evening, May 27, when her friends welcomed her cordially. Miss Armstrong was assisted by her sister, Miss Catharine Armstrong, who made her first appearance in London on the occasion, Mdlle. Angèle, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, Signors Federici and Caravoglia, as vocalists; and as instrumentalists, Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), Herr Louis Ries (violin), Monsieur Albert (violoncello), and Herr Svendsen (flute). The Misses Armstrong sang the duet from Figaro, "Sull' aria," and, as may be imagined, obtained the sympathies of the audience. Not, we must say, from mere friendly interest in the sisters, but also from the artistic style in which they gave Mozart's charming effusion. Miss E. Armstrong contributed also Paccini's "Il soave e bel contento" (Didone abbandonata), for which she was recalled; Bishop's "Ye little birds" (flute obbligato beautifully played by Herr Svendsen), which she was called upon to repeat, and several other concerted pieces. Miss Catharine Armstrong exhibited her vocal proficiency in Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," in which she pleased so much that she was unanimously recalled, and gave Rossini's "Una voce poco fa," which exhibited her florid vocalization to advantage. She also joined Signor Federici in the duet, "La ci darem la mano" (Don Giovanni), and acquitted herself entirely to the satisfaction of the audience. The programme was too long to give a detailed notice of all that was in it, but we must single out for praise Mozart's "O cara immagine" (Mr. Trelawny Cobham), a song by Signor Barri (Signor Caravoglia), and a flute solo (Herr Svendsen). The accompanists of the vocal music on the pianoforte were Herr W. Ganz, Signor Romano, Signor Vera, and Mr. Hullet.

The programme that M. Alexandre Billet submitted to his subscribers on the occasion of his second "pianoforte recital," which took place on Tuesday afternoon in St. George's Hall, was quite as interesting as that provided on the occasion of his first appeal to public favour this season. Schubert and Beethoven were finely represented by their respective works, Op. 99, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncelli, and Op. 110 for pianoforte solo; whilst the interest of the modern school was sustained by the presentation of Rubinstein's sonata in D major, Op. 18, for pianoforte and violoncello. That M. Billet is not only a master of his art, but one of the most admirable and well informed pianists of the day, is well known; and it is only necessary to ally his name with the classical composers to recall some of the most agreeable associations connected with the concert-room. Abstruse and difficult to understand as both Schubert and Beethoven occasionally are, M. Billet, in the two works which occupied the principal part of the programme on Tuesday afternoon, succeeded in gaining for them thorough appreciation, by his invariably accurate execution, musician-like playing, and exquisite taste, fairly enchanting the audience. In a Scherzo by Chopin (Op. 20), and Weber's famous Polacca in E, M. Billet's pleasing touch and brilliant execution were no less enthusiastically recognized. Mr. H. Holmes's fine violin playing, and M. Paque's no less excellent violoncello playing, contributed to the success of this "Recital." Some singing by Miss Purdy most pleasantly varied the attractions. Mr. Alfred Gilbert accompanied in his usual artistic style.

Angell Town Institution, Brixton.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was given on Monday by the Brixton Choral Society, under the direction of Dr. William Lemare. The principal vocalists were Madame Florence Lancia, Miss Adelaide Newton, and Messrs. Wilbye Cooper and Robert Hilton. It is needless to say that, with such names, the soli parts were most efficiently represented, and it is only due to the members of the choir to admit that the general rendering of the choruses was satisfactory. Dr. Lemare announces a concert for the 9th proximo, rather out of the beaten track of musical entertainments here, and comprising Mendelssohn's Athalie, the illustrative verses to which will be read by Mr. Robert Stroud, and the solos taken by Misses Ellen Horne, Agnes Drummond, and Adelaide Newton; and Mr. H. T. Craven's operetta, in one act, called Pride and Policy, for which Dr. Lemare has composed the music.

Messrs. Charles and Arthur Le Jeune, in conjunction with Mr. C. W. Le Jeune, gave the first of "Three Recitals" announced by them, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Thursday morning, May 29th. The clever young artists went through a programme of varied interest, and introduced several compositions for their "Orchestral Combination," as they entitle it, with great effect. Mr. Arthur Le Jeune played two pianoforte pieces, "Joyous Life" (his own composition), and "Silver Bells" (Wehli), shewing himself an excellent pianist and a pleasing composer, in addition to his other accomplishments. Mr. Charles Le Jeune's organ performances were as usual remarkably clever. He gave a "Grand March" of his own composition and an Andante by Batiste; and was rewarded by applause well deserved. The pieces for the "Orchestral Combination" were a composition by Arthur Le Jeune, "La Gaité," the overture to Zampa; an arrangement of airs from Il Trovatore, and a "Grand March" by Kalliwoda. In each of these they had the valuable co-operation of Mr. C. W. Le Jeune. The programme was interspersed with some "vocalisms" by the clever contralto, Miss Enriquez, and the "Recital" altogether gave complete satisfaction to all present. The next is announced for Friday morning, June 13th.

Madame Puzzi's annual morning concert was given on Monday, May 26, and, as usual, attracted a distinguished and fashionable audience. The locale was St. George's Hall, and the artists were, nearly all, popular Italian Opera singers, assisted by a few English and French artists. It is impossible to enumerate all the "good things" Madame Puzzi provided for her patrons, but we can say that the programme was one evidently entirely to their taste, judging by the satisfaction expressed on all sides. Among the Italians, Madame Trebelli came off with éclat, after singing "C'est L'Espagne," Signor Rota after "A tanto amor" (La Favorita), and Signor Gardoni after "Canto per te" (Badia); among the French, Mdlle. Marie Roze pleased greatly in Mr. Cowen's song, "Marie" (accompanied by the composer), Signor Naudin in a canzonet from Fra Diavolo, M. Jules Lefort in the Romance, "Comme à Vingt ans," and Signor Agnesi in Mr. Ketterer's "Land of Liberty;" and among the English, Mdme. Florence Lancia in "Good night, sweet Mother," and Miss Angèle in Mdme. Sainton-Dolby's "He thinks I do not love him." Among the concerted pieces given with effect were Mr. Leslie's trio, "Memory," sung by Mdme. Florence Lancia, Miss Angèle, and Mr. Trelawny Cobham; Signor Casta's Terzetto, "Vanne a colei," by Madame Anna Regan-Schimon, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, and Signor Gardoni; and the popular quintet from the Ballo in Maschera, by Mdme. Schimon, Miss Angèle, Signors Naudin, Agnesi, and Foli. A duet by Gabussi, "La Rondo," was capitally sung by Signors Gardoni and Foli; and "Parigi o cara," by Mdlle. Roze and Signor Naudin. The instrumental department was well represented, M. Paque playing one of his most admired violoncello fantasias, and Signor Tito Mattei one of his popular pianoforte pieces. Signor Rendano also contributed some pianoforte pieces, and Mr. John Thomas, the accomplished harpist, some of his arrangements of national Welsh melodies. The conductors were Signors Pinsuti, Vera, Randegger, Mons. Schimon, and Herr. W. Ganz.

PROVINCIAL.

DEVIZES.—The Devizes Advertiser of May 15 contained the subjoined:—

"The second performance for the season was given by the Amateur Choral Society on Tuesday. The music selected was Handel's Samson; the concert-hall was the spacious Corn Exchange, and the meeting was in every respect a brilliant success. It was little thought when the society was established, first as a private meeting of a few musical friends, and then as a class for the practice of congregational psalmody, that it would grow to the dimensions it has now attained; and although the experience of similar societies had before made it evident that Devizes was not lacking in musical talent, no one would then have supposed it possible that a composition like Samson, containing as it does some of Handel's finest descriptive music, could have been rendered by a number of mere amateurs with such accuracy, spirit, and effect as characterized the performance on Tuesday evening. The two ladies engaged were Miss Fanny Osman (soprano), and Miss Julia Elton (contralto). Miss Elton sang with great spirit, and her efforts gave complete satisfaction. The same may be said of Mr. Orlando Christian (bass), whose fine voice was heard to advantage as Harapha, the Philistine giant. Mr. Hunt (tenor) sang the music allotted to Samson with taste and expression—more especially the air 'Why does the God of Israel sleep?' and in the duet, 'Go, baffled coward'—but his voice had scarcely timbre enough for the large room in which he was singing. Of the choruses we cannot speak too highly. Indeed, it was a subject of general astonishment that, even with the practice they have had, the class should have done so well. The credit of this is due to the talented conductor, Mr. J. T. Abrahams, whose popularity continues to increase with his efforts."

WINDSOR.—We read in the Windsor and Eton Examiner of May 17 as follows:—

"The third concert of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, held on Monday evening, in St. Mark's School Room, was largely and fashionably attended. The members of the choir, under the direction of Sir George Elvey, showed that his instructions had not been lost upon them. The music performed was Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and The May Queen of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. The date and locality were especially adapted for the performance of The May Queen, the 12th May being old May-day, while, from the words, the scene of the May Queen's festivities would seem to be laid somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Royal borough, frequent reference being made to the meadows beside the 'Royal Thames,' while the Queen of England is introduced to quell a strife between 'two gallants for our May-day Queen.' There was a full orchestra, consisting of members of the Amateur Orchestral Society, and the Choral Society were assisted by Miss Ellen Horne, Master Cook, of the St. George's choir, Mr. Guy, and Mr. O. C. Christian, of Eton College. Mr. Griesbach acted as leader of the band, and Sir George Elvey as conductor."

EXETER.—THEATRE ROYAL.—The regular dramatic season has terminated at this place of amusement, and the house, this week, has been occupied by Mr. John Clarke, with his London comedy company. Ours has been the "pièce de résistance," and has succeeded in drawing large and fashionable audiences. With such principals as Mr. John Clarke, Mr. Charles Dornton, Mr. Cecil Murray, Mr. J. Edwards, and Mr. J. Cumberland, Miss Annie Lafontaine, Miss Ellen Mayne, and Miss Clara Burchell, an actress whose style is highly finished, we need scarcely say that entire justice has been done to the "business" and diction of this highly interesting comedy. The "Sairey Gamp" scene from Martin Chuzzlewit has brought the performances to a termination nightly, and has been highly appreciated. Exeter is a "safe find" for a really good entertainment, whether musical, or theatrical, their being a numerous and highly respectable population, and no music hall for it to frequent.

DUBLIN.—A Dublin journal has the following account of the concerts in the Exhibition Building:—

"Since the opening of the Exhibition on the 14th inst., Sir Edward Lee, manager, and Mr. A. Emden, secretary, have been making most laudable exertions to secure genuinely good vocal and instrumental music for the public. It is gratifying to be enabled to state that these efforts have been attended with most signal success, and have been fully and practically appreciated by those for whose benefit and enjoyment they have been made. The grand concerts of Saturday afternoon and evening furnished excellent proof that musical merit will always command in Dublin a crowded audience, and the names of such artists as Signor Foli, Signor Caravoglia, Mr. George Perren, Miss Annie Banks, and Miss Adelaide Newton being announced, gave good earnest of a rich treat. Signor Foli has no superior as a basso, and the fame he has gained on the lyric stage made thousands anxious to hear him. Signor Caravoglia was also most favourably known as a highly accomplished baritone singer; Mr. George Perren and the Misses Banks and Newton were high in public estimation as concert vocalists, and the Exhibition orchestral band, under the conductorship of Mr. R. M. Levey, has a very high character. In the evening every part of the concert hall was filled by an audience more given to encoring than any we remember to have met with. Signor Foli having sung Arditi's 'Stirrup Cup' splendidly, the encoring mania commenced, and the noisy 're-demands,' in almost every instance, had to be complied with. A solo harp performance at the close of the first part of the concert, given by Miss Emilie Glover, was truly excellent. She played with an amount of skill, gracefulness, elegance, and finish, which insured for her loud and long-continued applause. The success of Saturday evening's concert proved the wisdom of low prices, and the rule with the management should be to give the greatest possible amount of musical value for a shilling."

BIRMINGHAM.—We have had an excellent concert in the Masonic Hall, on Wednesday evening, in aid of the funds of the Children's Hospital. The performers were Madame Sidney Pratten (solo guitar), Miss Edith Antell and Mr. W. Insull (vocalists), Mr. C. J. Duchemin (solo pianoforte), and the members of the Germania Liederkranz (choral), and of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union (orchestral); the whole being under the direction of Mr. Duchemin. The Daily Post, in a notice of the concert, writes:—

"Madame Sidney Pratten, the widow of the eminent flautist, has achieved for herself a scarcely inferior reputation as a mistress of the guitar, an instrument the resources of which are so little understood in this country, even by professional musicians, that its introduction on this occasion was almost in the nature of a new revelation. Its advantages, for the purposes of vocal accompaniment, in a certain class of simple songs, serenades, &c., are well known, but as a solo instrument its claims have yet to win their way to general acceptance. To this end Madame Pratten's several performances on Wednesday night must have powerfully contributed, judging by the applause evoked by her efforts." And the Morning News says:—"The performances of Madame Sydney Pratten upon the guitar were, from their novelty and the delicate effects they introduced, amongst the most interesting portions of the programme. Both solos were listened to with the greatest attention, and were loudly applauded, the second one being re-demanded.'

BRIGHTON.—Mr. Aptommas has been giving some harp recitals in the Pavilion, and Miss Flora Heilbron at the Aquarium, where also Madame Patey sang some of her most popular songs before a very large audience. The band of the Queen's Bays have also been playing at the Aquarium, and Miss Edith Wynne is announced to sing there this morning. Dr. Hans von Bülow gave a recital in the Pavilion on Wednesday morning last.

A GRAND Opera concert is announced to take place at the Royal Albert Hall on Whit-Monday evening, in which Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Signori Campanini, Agnesi, and Borella will take part. The programme will be very attractive, containing, amongst other pieces, Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" (solo by Mdlle. Tietjens), and the "Miserere" scene from Il Trovatore, with Mdlle. Tietjens and Signor Campanini. Popular part-songs will be sung by the members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby. The concert will prove a great attraction to holiday folks.

PARMA.—Signor Verdi, accompanied by his wife, recently attended a representation of his opera, La Forza del Destino, here. The theatre was crowded, and many of the ladies were dressed in green (verde), out of compliment to the celebrated composer.

PESTH.—Herr Richard Wagner's Fliegende Holländer has been successfully produced, thanks to the zeal displayed by the solo singers, the chorus, the orchestra, the scene painter and the master-carpenter, quite as much as to the music of the Future.

MDLLE. DÉSCLÉE IN FROU-FROU.

The long-expected treat of the arrival of Mdlle. Déselée has at length been obtained, the most delightful of modern artists having made her first appearance in London on Monday week. Such an occasion was, as might be expected, a matter of extreme interest, and the theatre was filled from the pit to the ceiling with an audience, including the sommités of literature, art, rank, and fashion. Those who had seen Mdlle. Déselée in Paris came to refresh agreeable and never-to-be-forgotten memories. Those who had not seen her were anxious to make amends for previous shortcomings, and curious to see how far were justified the extraordinary eulogies of which the actress had been the object. The play in which she appeared was, fortunately for the majority of the audience, tolerably familiar, having already been given by one English and two French companies. The attitude of the spectators towards an artist so accustomed to a burst of excitement on her every appearance was not the least curious part of the performance. This was profoundly critical. They saw a young and clever-looking woman bound on to the stage in a grey amazone, and they watched eagerly to see when the special gifts that had placed her on the throne of art would reveal themselves. During the first two acts of Frou-Frou nothing was seen that need cause surprise. Elegance, vivacity, and refinement were exhibited. These gifts are not uncommon, however, upon the stage; and the measure in which they are possessed by the new comer, though great, was scarcely excessive. As the story progressed, however, with deepening interest, when the frivolous woman was roused by wrongs the most likely to influence one of her shallow natureand nervous temperament, the merit of heracting became apparent. An exposition more elaborate, more artistic, and more finished than that of Frou-Frou has certainly not been seen. So full of detail was it, not only in the time when the character was prominently before the public, but in the by-play, that attention almost painful was demanded to avoid losing some beauty of exposition. The scene in the third act, in which Frou-Frou listens upon the sofa to the result of the application for the hand of Louise, and deludes herself into the not very unnatural conclusion that her place in her household has been seized by her false sister, is a triumph of interpretation. Every movement, every gesture, is indicative. The conception of the character is perfect, and the exposition of it goes beyond the idea of the writer. A more living and recognisable portraiture was never seen. Mdlle. Déselée is, in fact, Frou-Frou; has quite sunk her identity, for stage purposes, in that of the eager, childish, impetuous, nervous creature she presents. Frou-Frou is the type of the woman of to-day. Her highly nervous temperament is the result of the artificial civilization beneath which we live. Spoiled, flattered, caressed, she has grown up with no sobering responsibilities of life to counteract her flighty disposition, or act as ballast to a ship with so dangerously light a cargo. Every duty of maternity should weigh upon one framed like her, and no household care should be removed from her. But her sister has entered the house, and Frou-Frou is treated as a clever, dear, beautiful, delightful toy. She is a woman after all, and womanly temptation bèsets her. She turns for protection, but there is none. She rides upon a vessel from which masts, ropes, and bulwarks have been cut, and she is necessarily engulphed. Her sister has taken her place, and she may keep it. Heedless and reckless, yielding to the one powerful impulse her life has known, an impulse strong enough to sway her nature, during which her separation from good is accomplished, the enraged woman leaves her husband's door. Buffeted, breathless, spent, but sensible of her fault, she returns to die. But in dying, as in living, she is ever Frou-Frou. Her penitence is ephemeral. Nothing can make lasting impression upon her. She is a mirror, which reflects the object before it, and which you may break, but cannot dent. When her eyes are closing and the râle is in her throat, she thinks of her dress, and wishes to look gracious in her death gear. All this is conveyed by Mdlle. Déselée in a manner absolutely unsurpassable. The nervous temperament breaks out in a hundred nameless ways. In her moments of excitement her fingers creep and close over whatever is nearest. She walks like some caged animal around the furniture, she folds pieces of paper up unconsciously into fans. All to which nervous excitement can prompt is done with exquisite naturalness and ease, and little petulant outbursts are succeeded by affectionate and caressing demonstrations against which none can be proof. She seems half-innocent even in error, for her bird-like nature seems as if shame glided off it without effort. Her manner of standing by her husband, playing with the button on his coat and plucking from it stray pieces of cotton, is typical of a hundred things equally true in conception and delicious in rendering. Whether the art of this dainty actress is too delicate for English taste remains to be seen. The English are slow of comprehension in matters of art, and, it may be, they will scarcely grasp the marvellous delicacy and subtlety of Mdlle, Déselée's performance. This much at least must be said. Like some fine melody it requires to be often heard and half-learned by heart before its full beauty is realised, and, like a fine painting, the more it is seen the more it grows upon you. We do not wish to be extravagant. Whether Mdlle. Déselée could play a part like Lady Macbeth (for which she seems absolutely fitted), Medea, or Phédre, we cannot say, but in exposition of the tragedy of modern life she stands supreme.

> The effect of the "death-solace" on a person in full health is very peculiar; it stimulates and excites, and is altogether prejudicial; and although it would rather do good than harm to a weakly person, its great virtues are only shown when taken by a man in his last moments. Where it is desirable merely to calm or to rouse, there are other and more effectual preparations.—"Another World."

Désiré, the famous artist of the Bouffes-Parisiens, is dead.

M. Mermet's Jeanne d'Arc has been rehearsed at the opera in Paris.

M. Offenbach, now director of the Gaité, will, it is said, begin with a popular drama in five acts and eight tableaux, entitled Robert Mirone, Prévôt des Marchands.

The Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston is fifty-eight years old. It was established in 1815, by some thirty singers, and it now numbers about seven hundred voices.

A novelty at one of the recent Philharmonic concerts in Vienna was the performance of a cycle of five symphonies, entitled Melusine, composed by Herr Julius Zellner.

Handel's Alexander's Feast has been executed in Paris by the Choral Society Bourgault-Ducoudray, with the orchestra of M. Colonne. Several choruses were encored.

Miss Edith Wynne is engaged for the forthcoming Hereford and Glasgow Festivals as well as at the Grand National Eisteddfod to be holden at Wold in August next.

The success of M. Paul Féval's lecture on Beaumarchais, at the Gaité Théâtre in Paris was so complete that M. Ballande engaged M. Féval to repeat it at Rouen and Havre.

At the Glasgow Musical Festival in the first week of November next, one evening will be devoted to a new work by Mr. Henry Smart, called Jacob, composed specially for the occasion.

In consequence of a contract entered into between M. Offenbach, Porte St. Martin Theatre, Paris, and M. Hostein, the Renaissance will become, every other night, a theatre for music.

When Lohengrin is produced by the New Philharmonic Society, the parts will be distributed as follows:—Lohengrin, Signor Mongini; the King, Mr. Lewis Thomas; Elsa, Mdlle. Zorani.

A new home must be found for Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, who announce that this will be their last season at the Gallery of Illustration, in consequence of the expiration of their tenancy.

The Crown Diamonds of Auber is in rehearsal at Covent Garden, the part of Catarina to be played by Mdme. Patti. M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet is also in rehearsal, with Mdlle. Albani as Ophelia.

Signor Pinsuti's new opera, Il Mercante di Venezia (The Merchant of Venice), is fixed upon for the opening of the opera at Boulogne next autumn. Meyerbeer's Africaine and Verdi's Aida are to follow.

Madame Ristori has been engaged for eight representations at Drury Lane Theatre. She will appear on the 11th of June, and the succeeding Fridays and Wednesdays. One of her characters is to be Marie Antoinette.

La Fille de Madame Angot increases in attraction every evening at the St. James's Theatre. During the past week, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and other notabilities "assisted" at the performances.

William Henry Tolhurst, whose death at Praloran (Melbourne) we announced last week, was the founder of the Maidstone Sacred Harmonic Society; the son of Henry Tolhurst, popular composer of Church anthems in the last century; a most enthusiastic amateur, of ripe judgment and rare capacity.

Stanley brought with him a young African who is said to be very musical. In his sleep he sings a song with this refrain:—

"Strilli kiyaya ambobodoyon,
Matatatal allalegont lillibala,
Trallalitti bnllgallon mootoo."

Between one and four o'clock on Saturday morning the Star Theatre and Music-hall, Princess Street, Derby, was totally destroyed by fire. On the previous Saturday night a drama, entitled The Poor of New York, was performed, one of the "features" of the entertainment being the spectacle of a house in flames. The proprietor, it is understood, is insured.

A correspondent informs the Choir that a letter from abroad has been addressed to Dr. Hans von Bülow as follows:—"Au plus distingué musicien Monsieur von Bülow, Société Philharmonique, Londres." This letter first went to Islington, where the post-office authorities inscribed the following on the envelope: "Not known at the Philharmonic Hall, Islington."

The musical critic of the Cincinnati Enquirer says that Miss Kellogg is, in every tissue, an American girl. She is this in her delicate beauty; her lithe yet perfect form; her tiny, snow-white hand and Arab foot." Her Arab foot has often been remarked, but it never seemed to us so thoroughly American as her Ionic nose, her Sardinian chin, or her bewitching French mannerisms.

The dramatic sensation of the next American season will be the joint appearance of the great Italian tragedian, Salvini, and Adelaide Ristori, who are engaged by an American impresario for a tour of the States. They will appear in this city in the latter part of August, in the tragedy of Othello, with Salvini in the title rôle, and Ristori as Desdemona.

The Princess's Theatre is to re-open, after the termination of the season of French plays, with Manfred. Mr. Guiver will be the manager.

Musical critics flourish in the West, as will be seen from the following accidental review of a prima donna's lyric efforts:—"She had, and we suppose still retains, a magnificent voice for a fog whistle. Its compass was perfectly surprising. She would shake the chandelier with a wild whoop that made every man instinctively feel for his scalp, and followed it up with a roar that would shame a bassoon."

Miss Antoniette Sterling, before leaving for Europe, will give a farewell concert at Irving Hall, on Tuesday evening next, May 13th, assisted by several excellent artists. We shall be sorry to lose Miss Sterling, for a more thorough and conscientious artist does not exist in our midst, while her voice is of such exquisite beauty, that we know no parallel to it but that of the great Alboni. We do not know if Miss Sterling proposes to remain long abroad, but we are satisfied that wherever she goes she will make her mark, and meet with far more distinction than has been vouchsafed her in her own country.—Watson.

On the 15th inst., Herr Ernst Pauer delivered a lecture on "Louis van Beethoven" before the members of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts. Sir Julius Benedict presided. The lecturer gave a highly interesting resumé of the great master's works, referring especially to the "Moonlight Sonata" as alone being sufficient to hand his name down to posterity as one of the greatest composers of his age. The dignity of his art was to Beethoven all in all. In his most trifling compositions the same care and thought are as manifest as in his grandest works—and this Sonata, together with "Variations on a Russian dance" (composed in 1793), and a Fantasia, Herr Pauer rendered with taste and feeling rarely surpassed.—Communicated.

The musical critic of the Springfield Republican was exalted to a pitch of mere frenzy, the other evening, by one of Rubinstein's performances. This is the way he frantically foams:—

"The entrancing dreaminess, the mysterious outlines, the secret undertone of night, the maddening calmness of the full moon—in fine, all the deeper poetic meanings of the magic composition, were given revelation to to a degree unconceived even by real artists. It was only too painful an ecstacy for the sensitive hearer."

To get painful ecstasies and the maddening calmness of the full moon out of a piano has been reserved for Rubinstein. Perhaps anybody would do well to avoid meeting that maddened critic by moonlight hereafter.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

The Accras are passionately fond of singing, but the composition of their songs is usually the momentary effects of the prolific fancy or genius of the persons who are dancing, or working, or playing. The extemporaneous songs are remarkable for their wit and satire. To obtain them in their integrity, and with a pretension to correctness, is impossible, for they are sung at night, and their style and spirit are sustained by grimaces, antics, intonations, and interjections, not to be transferred by the pen to paper. Like the Fantees, the Accras repose unshaken faith in the incarnation of ghosts. Hence, on a dark night, when the moon is no more above the horizon, they will abandon themselves to sleep; but the rising of the moon is the signal for the song and the monotonous roll of the tom-tom. Their dances go on throughout the long and glorious nights. Their martial songs or amorous ditties are thus shouted in a deafening chorus from the first ray of moonlight streaming gently upwards in the East to the last ray fading as gently downwards in the West.

The opening of the Muswell Hill rival of Sydenham seems to have added another monster, and, therefore, monstrous, concert-room to a list which is already far too long. We say "seems" advisedly, for happy accident, in the shape of a sounding board or some other form of chance, may yet, though improbably, make the Alexandra Palace an exception to the usual inefficacy of such patchwork. The craze for using as concert-rooms areas that are only fitted for bull-fights or international bazaars is likely to have a lamentable effect upon music in the course of a few years. Bawling will take the place of singing, and it unfortunately happens that proficients in the art of bawling are seldom proficients in the art of tune. Monster arenas will demand monster performances, in which the science of conducting will be forgotten. Whole audiences will go away thinking they have heard music when they have heard only its confused echoes—the wind instruments repeating themselves in one corner, the violins in another, the voices in a third. Throats capable of better things will be ruined prematurely, not in attempting to sing, but in trying to be simply audible at impracticable distances. Under these circumstances sensible singers will probably bye-and-by content themselves with being looked at, and sensible auditors with looking on, so that, between silence and chaos, music will have to creep back into the drawing-room corners from which we boast that we have dragged it. Considering that "we are a musical nation," it is curious what pains and expense we take to hear either imperfectly or not at all.—Globe.

In his recently published novel, "The Parisians," Lord Lytton laid down an emphatic opinion on the gender of musical genius—the only historical and only possible gender. The heroine is an Italian prima donna, who is supposed to relate in a letter this interesting incident. It is fair to assume that "the great Maestro" is Rossini:—"I must confide to you one ambition which, during the lazy Italian summer, took possession of me—I must tell you the ambition, and add that I have renounced it as a vain one. I had hoped that I could compose, I mean in music. I was pleased with some things I did—they expressed in music what I could not express in words; and one secret object in coming here was to submit them to the great Maestro. He listened to them patiently; he complimented me on my accuracy in the mechanical laws of composition; he even said that my favourite airs were touchants et gracieux. And so he would have left me, but I stopped him timidly, and said, 'Tell me frankly, do you thing that with time and study I could compose music such as singers equal to myself would sing to?' 'You mean as a professional composer?'—'Well, yes.' 'And to the abandonment of your vocation as a singer?'—'Yes.' 'My dear child, I should be your worst enemy if I encouraged such a notion; cling to the career in which you can be greatest; gain but health, and I wager my reputation on your glorious success on the stage. What can you be as a composer? You will set pretty music to pretty words, which will be sung in drawing-rooms with the fame, a little more or less, that generally attends the compositions of female amateurs. Aim at something higher, as I know you would do, and you will not succeed. Is there any instance in modern times, perhaps in any times, of a female composer who has attained even to the eminence of a third-rate opera writer? Composition in letters may be of no sex. In that Madame Dudevant and your friend, Madame de Grantmesnil, can beat most men; but the genius of musical composition is homme, and accept it as a compliment when I say that you are essentially femme.' He left me, of course, mortified and humbled; but I feel he is right as regards myself, though, whether in his depreciation of our whole sex, I cannot say.

WEIMAR.—It is just a century this month since the first German opera ever played in Germany was produced, here. It is entitled, Alcestis, the words being by Wieland, and the music by Schweitzer. The celebrated Mdme. Romanio Koch sustained the principal female part.

VIENNA.—The members of the Männergesangverein have resolved to give, during the period of the International Exhibition, five public performances, namely: two concerts in the large room of the Musical Union, and three "Liedertafeln," or Vocal Gatherings, at the New World in Hietzing. The proceeds will be devoted to charitable purposes.—The Schubert and the Beethoven Festivals, were great successes.

NAPLES.—A new opera, L'Impresario per Progetto, by Signor Michele Ruta, will be produced this season at the Teatro Rossi.

MILAN.—Signor Carlo Pedrotti has arrived in this city, to superintend the rehearsals of his new opera, Olema la Schiave, at the Teatro dal Verme. Signora Galletti will sustain the part of the heroine.

TAGANROG.—After an interval of two years, there will again be an Italian opera here next season.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—A new place of amusement, the Crescent Gardens, has just been opened. One of the principal attractions is a theatre, in which an Italian company will perform the most popular operas of the day.

ANCONA.—Signor Verdi's Aida has proved a great success at the Teatro delle Muse. The principal characters were sustained by Signora Stolz, Signori Pantaleoni and Maini.

TURIN.—Il Cadetto di Quascogna, a new opera by Signor De Ferrari, has been very favourably received here.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

PREFACE.

No country possesses more good voices than England, and many voices would be a fortune to their owners if they knew how to use them.

Vocal Exercises, however, are much neglected, owing, in a great measure, to their monotony of passage and of style.

The object of these Studies is to make practice as attractive as possible, and the Waltz form has therefore been chosen for its liveliness.

A selection has been made of passages best suited to give flexibility to the voice, and the six Waltzes here presented contain the germs of a thorough method of vocal practice.

The Italian language is preferred on account of the openness of the vowels; but these studies can be used advantageously without words, by simply "vocalising" on the vowel A (pronounced in Italian, Ah.)

Commas (,) are placed where breath is to be taken. At first, however, pupils should practise each study very slowly, and draw breath whenever found necessary.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From "Macmillan's Magazine.")

"Hermes," the "editor" of the remarkable book which bears the above title, is certainly an extraordinary person; so extraordinary, indeed, that those who agree to believe that he has actual knowledge of the goings-on in a planet which is not ours, and which appears to be Mars, may consistently carry their faith a degree further, and believe likewise that he calls himself by his real name, and is in some way an Avatar of Hermes Trismegistus.

Varying opinions have been expressed as to the purpose of the book, though there is no disagreement as to the fact that from beginning to end it is amusing and suggestive. Some look upon this "Other World" as one of the numerous Utopias which imaginative philanthropists have devised as models to which less perfect communities should at least endeavour to approximate; others have arrived at the conclusion that a satire on the defects of our present civilization is intended, and that the "editor" is less an aspiring Plato than a polite Swift. If, as Voltaire said, Swift was Rabelais in his senses, assuredly "Hermes" is Swift in his most mannerly condition.

To neither of these opinions do we give assent. If it had been the design of "Hermes" to embody his ideal of a perfect commonwealth, he would naturally have given us a more distinct account of the political institutions of Montalluyah, the city to which his fragmentary communications refer, and which comprises the most habitable portion of the planet. But with such institutions we are made less acquainted than with any other particular connected with this veritable Newfoundland. We learn, indeed, that Montalluyah is governed by one Supreme Ruler, who bears the singular title "Tootmanyoso," and is assisted by twelve inferior kings; but with respect to the functions of these inferior potentates—whether they are executive, legislative, or administrative, or are mere privy councillors with a royal handle to their names—we are left in utter ignorance. Neither do we find the slightest hints of any representative institution, oligarchic or democratic, that in the least resembles our notions of a senate or parliament. We are taught that a great and beneficent revolution was effected by what is commonly called a "virtuous despot;" but we are wholly in the dark as to the character of the political superstructure which he raised on the site left open by the extirpation of old abuses.

On the other hand, the opinion that a fanciful satire is intended, rather than the presentation of an Utopia, is more plausible; for if "Hermes" scarcely grazes upon politics, he is profuse in his description of those details of manners and customs which are ordinarily the mark of the social satirist. If we have not heard how the favoured race are governed, we at any rate know to a nicety how they are brought up, how they are physicked, how they go courting, how they are married, how they are treated when they come into the world, how pleasantly they slide out of it, how they play music, how they pay compliments, and how they cook. Few cockneys are more familiar with life in London than any one who has mastered the communications of "Hermes" is familiar with life in Montalluyah.

Now the general impression made by the minute description of the state of society in the star-city is that it is far better, and indicates a far higher civilization than any to be found on the surface of our own globe. Vice has altogether gone out of fashion, to make room, not for an ascetic bliss, but for the power of sinlessly and elegantly indulging in luxuries, which an Assyrian voluptuary might have contemplated with envy. As an enthusiastic description of a superior condition of things necessarily implies a censure of that which is inferior, it must naturally have somewhat of a satirical appearance when addressed to persons living under less advantageous circumstances. Sterne's proposition, that "they manage things better in France," converts itself without a thought into "they manage things worse in England," and the superior goodness of the planet Mars implies the comparative badness of Mother Earth. So far as this is satire, "Hermes" may be deemed a satirist.

But as to his being an intentional satirist, we believe nothing of the kind. A glow of good humour is diffused over the entire book, which justifies the supposition that "Hermes" is far too much delighted with the enjoyments he is describing to find room on his lip for a sneer at terrestrial defects and miseries. Let us rather imagine that he is a poetical utilitarian, who tries to picture the state of things that will arrive when not only the greatest but the most luxurious happiness is diffused amongst the greatest number. Of a state of primitive simplicity, of an Arcadia peopled with smart shepherds and shepherdesses, he has no notion. If we would be as good and as contented as the citizens of Montalluyah, we must become more, not less, Epicurean than we are at present—improve our music, our pictures, our means of locomotion, and our dinners.

For instance, we of this generation are very proud of our electricity; and when an enthusiastic optimist wishes to illustrate the superiority of the present to the past, the first thing to which he refers is probably the electric telegraph. But in our use of this agent we are mere babies compared with the Tootmanyoso and his subjects. Their advance commenced—so Hermes tells us—with the discovery that electricities are so many and so various, that although they may all be classed under one category, rubricked in the Martial language with a term denoting a "spark of Heaven-power," every kind of body, both animate or inanimate, contains an electricity of its own. So diverse are the natures of these electricities that some are diffused, others concentrated; some sympathetic, some antipathetic, some gently mingling with others; some, when brought into contact with others, causing violent explosions.

Having discovered the existence of these various electricities, the sages of Montalluyah next found out how to extract them from all sorts of organic and inorganic substances. As fish are enumerated, "Hermes" warns us not to be too proud of our own torpedo. "In naming fish," he says, "I refer to several species, and not merely to those already known to you as electrical, and which have the power of emitting strong currents of their own peculiar electricity. A huge fish, well known on your earth, supplies us with the most powerful of all electricities, an electricity of immense value." So it appears we are starving in the midst of undetected plenty. Philanthropist as he is, why does not "Hermes" name the precious fish, instead of tantalising us with a conundrum? If we knew where to find it, doubtless we should do as they do in Montalluyah. Three large docks are built, into which the "sea-monster" is driven, to be subjected to the process by which he is made to yield up the electricity contained in his huge frame. The different kinds of electricity, when extracted, are stored ready for use in a large building, where, to prevent mischief, they are secured in non-conducting pouches, and placed in separate compartments.

To enumerate the uses to which the very plural electricities are put would require more space than we can afford to devote to the contemplation of the star-city. Indeed, it is not too much to say that there is a current of electricity through the entire book. One exploit, performed partly by means of this powerful agent, exceptionally deserves mention, especially as the account of it involves a description of the physical configuration of Montalluyah. A huge mountain mass, it seems, projects from the elevated continent of Montalluyah for miles above the sea, the relic of a vast convulsion of nature, which, sweeping away its former basis, left it unsupported, save by its adhesion to the main continent of which it forms a part. From the point of junction it extends horizontally far beyond the sea coast, over cities built on the ridges and plains beneath; and it is of such a high elevation that when seen from below it is not easily distinguishable from the clouds above. Another city is built on the suspended mountain itself.

Even to the dull eye of an inhabitant of our earth, the position of the citizens either upon or below a horizontal mass of rock so slightly supported would have seemed undesirable. The possibility of a crash, involving the destruction of those who fell and those upon whom the fall took place, seems so obvious to the meanest understanding, that one marvels why the good folks of Montalluyah chose to build in such dangerous regions. We must assume that they were not very bright before the days of the reforming Tootmanyoso. Even an occasional fall of portions of the under part of the suspended mass, destroying half a dozen cities or so, with all their inhabitants, was not sufficient to awaken the occupants of more fortunate sites to a sense of their peril. But to the keen eye of the Tootmanyoso it was manifest that a vertical prop was required at or towards the end of the suspended mass, opposite to the point of junction with the continent. A figure which looked like a capital F, or a gibbet, had to be converted into a semblance of the Greek Π, or an integral portion of Stonehenge, or who knows what mischief might have ensued?

By the direction of the Tootmanyoso the perils menaced by the suspended mountain were arrested by the erection of a "mountain-supporter," whose base at the foundation is more than a mile in diameter, and whose round walls are more than a hundred feet in thickness. The diameter of the tower-head is one-third of the diameter of the base, and the diminution is so gradual as to be scarcely perceived. The material out of which the blocks of which the building is constructed are made is composed of an amalgamation of iron and marble fused into a compact mass.

This vast work was not to be accomplished without the aid of electricity, since no merely mechanical power would have sufficed to raise the stupendous blocks to the required level. The discovery had happily been made that what we call gravity is merely "tenacious electricity," and that this may become so much diminished that the heaviest body will become comparatively light. Where can be found a more simple and beautiful application of science to the wants of practical life?

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

(From the "Birmingham Daily Post.")

The general outline of the great musical event of the year, which, though local in celebration and objects, is yet, in some sense, of national interest, was definitely agreed upon at the meeting of the Birmingham Festival Committee on Saturday. Its principal features have been foreshadowed, if not positively specified, for some months past; but now that the gaps are filled up, and we are enabled to view the scheme as a whole, we are in a better position to estimate the value and significance of its component parts. The Festival will open on Tuesday the 26th of August, with the customary performance of Elijah, which has occupied that position with, we believe, one ill-advised exception, in 1864, at every Festival since its original production here, under the composer's direction in 1846. At the evening concert, on Tuesday, the special feature will be a new cantata, entitled, Fridolin, by Signor Randegger. Wednesday morning will be signalised by the production of a new oratorio, The Light of the World, by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and the evening concert, among other items of interest, will include a short composition by Rossini, new to the English public, and a Beethoven symphony. On Thursday morning the Messiah holds its time-honoured place—the miscellaneous attractions of the evening concert being strengthened by a new cantata, by Signor Schira, entitled The Lord of Burleigh, and a new chorus by Rossini. Friday morning, according to established precedent, is given up to a composite performance of sacred works, comprising Spohr's cantata, God, Thou art great, Haydn's Third, or Imperial Mass, new posthumous choral works by Rossini, and a double chorus from Israel in Egypt. The evening concert will also, according to approved precedent, be devoted to oratorio, the work selected being Judas Maccabeus. On the whole we think the scheme must be acknowledged a good and attractive, if not a positively brilliant, one. Considering the limited opportunities for new experiment allowed by the exigencies of the case, and especially the allocation of two out of the four mornings to those indispensable classics, Elijah and the Messiah, it cannot be said that there is any lack of novelty in the scheme. Besides the three works specially commissioned for the Festival, there will be no less than four minor compositions by Rossini, three sacred and one secular, which have not yet been heard by the English public. Two of these, we believe, have been performed on the Continent, but the other two, from among the composer's posthumous works, are private property, and will be publicly produced for the first time at a Festival in August next. As regards the commissioned works, the most important, of course, will be the oratorio by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, of which great things are foreshadowed by the Orchestral Committee. Though written specially for the forthcoming festival, it has, we believe, been a long time under careful and anxious consideration, and may be regarded as embodying the matured fruits of the genius of one of the most refined, scholarly, and original of our native composers. About two-thirds of the work are already in the hands of the chorus, and the remainder is expected in the course of the next few weeks. Signor Randegger's cantata, Fridolin, founded on the well-known poem of Schiller, was originally intended for last Festival; but, finding himself unable to complete it in time, the composer laid the work aside, and has since, we believe, entirely remodelled it. Signor Randegger is well known as a fanciful and fluent musician, and the subject he has selected can hardly fail to inspire him. Signor Schira, whose compositions are perhaps better known in Italy than in England, is, nevertheless, well esteemed in this country as a graceful and musicianly writer, and his cantata, founded on Tennyson's Lord of Burleigh, has already won golden opinions among the chorus engaged in its rehearsal. The inclusion in Friday's programme of a work by Spohr is an innovation which will be warmly appreciated by the more cultivated class of music lovers, who have long been remonstrating against the virtual veto placed by the Festival authorities on the works of the great violinist, author, and composer, to whom we owe, among other works, that wonderful oratorio, Die letzten Dinge. The cantata selected for the ensuing Birmingham Festival, and originally proposed for last Festival, is of a less ambitious, but not less beautiful order, and is, moreover, free from the religious objections which apply, in this country, to the musical representation of so dread a solemnity as the Last Judgment. The only other novel feature of the scheme calling for notice at present is the introduction of an orchestral symphony at one of the evening concerts. This is an experiment which has been long and warmly urged by the more musical section of the public, but resisted hitherto by the Festival managers, on the ground chiefly that it was tried in former years, and had to be abandoned in deference to the opposition of the non-musical majority of the Festival audiences. It is to be hoped, however, that the spread of musical education has by this time altered the balance of parties, and that the admirers of symphony will be sufficiently numerous at next Festival to vindicate the judgment of the committee in sanctioning the change. It would certainly be a pity if a magnificent band like that of Sir Michael Costa were allowed to disperse without affording the local public an example of orchestral music in its highest and most perfect developement. The gap has been in some measure filled of late years by the pianoforte concerto performances, in which Madame Arabella Goddard has been associated with the band; but at the best a pianoforte concerto is not a symphony; and now that Madame Goddard's tour in the Antipodes deprives us for a time of her presence, we think the committee have done wisely in trying a "change of diet." With reference to the absence of M. Gounod from the competition of composers, it will be seen from Mr. Peyton's explanation on Saturday that it has arisen from temporary circumstances over which the committee had practically no control, and that is, at the worst, a pleasure not abandoned but postponed. From M. Gounod we have a right to expect a masterpiece, and if the time and conditions did not admit of the production of a work of importance, we think that it was better on both sides that the commission should be deferred. Touching the artists, it would as yet be premature to speak, seeing that the whole of the engagements are not yet concluded; but the public will no doubt be satisfied to hear that all the principal vocalists essential to the performance of oratorio music have been secured, and that the only remaining engagements affect what we may term the luxuries or dainties of vocal art, represented by leading operatic stars, who are required to shed lustre on the evening concerts. Bearing in mind the difficulties with which the Orchestral Committee have to contend, between the necessity on the one side, of keeping up the pecuniary productions of the Festival, and the duty, on the other, of sustaining the musical prestige—difficulties not a little enhanced by the progress of modern competition and the increased facilities for attending the colossal musical combinations of Sydenham—the arrangements for the Birmingham Festival, of 1873, as far as at present revealed, seem to be all that could be reasonably required, if not all that could be ideally conceived, and it only remains to hope that the details will correspond to the general plan.

DUSSELDORF.—A grand performance of Herr Max Bruch's Odysseus was given, a short time since, in the Town Music Hall, which holds more than 2,000 persons. Every place was full, and several hundred individuals were unable to obtain admission. The vocalists numbered from five to six hundred, the instrumentalists being proportionately numerous. The composer himself conducted, and was received, on making his appearance, with a flourish from the orchestra and loud applause from the audience. The performance, as a performance, gave, on the whole, satisfaction, but exception was taken to a great deal of the book and to not a little of the music. Herr Raff, the author of the former, has not been especially happy in his lines, nor very particular respecting the original story. The music, in the opinion of competent critics, wants force and individuality, but, for all that, it contains some grand touches, which may be ranked among the best things Herr Bruch has yet done. Mdme. Joachim, as Penelope, exerted herself to the utmost, and was loudly applauded throughout. Mdlle. Lautertach, also, from the Opera in Cologne, produced a favourable impression, and did full justice to the music entrusted to her. The gentlemen solo-singers were Herr G. Henschel, from Berlin (who was engaged at the very last moment, in place of Herr Hill, hoarse), and Herr Eigenberts, from Rheydt.

GOTHA.—At the annual anniversary concert of the Liedertafel, Herr F. Grützmacher, from Dresden, played a Concerto by Molique, a Romance, Op. 102, by Schumann, and a Fantasia of his own composition. He was greatly and deservedly applauded.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW.

(From the "Times.")

Some interesting performances, under the denomination of "Pianoforte Recitals"—a denomination invented, if we remember well, by Liszt, originator and master of what is called "sensational playing"—have been recently given. Foremost among them must be counted the "Recitals" of Dr. Hans Von Bülow, a "sensational" player, if there ever was one. Although this is his first visit to England, the name of Dr. von Bülow has long been familiar to this country. He is not only a son-in-law of the renowned Abbé Liszt, but one of the most enthusiastic disciples of Herr Richard Wagner, and promoter of what appear to many sober thinkers the wildly-ambitious schemes and well-nigh impossible theories of that would-be great reformer, in all that concerns music in its alliance with the drama—operatic music, in fact. Beyond this, putting aside, if we can, which is not over easy, Herr Anton Rubinstein (Carl Tausig being gone from us), certainly Dr. Von Bülow is the most energetic and brilliant surviving representative of the Liszt school. Dr. von Bülow's execution on the pianoforte is prodigious, and equally so his memory. He scarcely ever introduces a piece, no matter by what master, with the printed music before him. Since he has been among us he has played two grand concertos with orchestral accompaniments, by Beethoven (in E flat, No. 5, at the Philharmonic concerts, and in G, No. 4, at the Crystal Palace); the grand concerto by Adolphe Henselt in F minor, at the New Philharmonic, and another by Rubinstein in G, again at the Old Philharmonic—one and all from memory. We own with deference that we feel less entirely satisfied with Herr von Bülow's readings of Beethoven than with his readings of Henselt and Rubinstein. Their concertos are essentially bravura pieces, and in bravura pieces Herr von Bülow unquestionably shows to the best advantage. In Beethoven we look for more reticence and less self-demonstration. No doubt Herr von Bülow is quite on a poetic and intellectual level with the two more modern composers; but that is by no means the case with regard to Beethoven. Beethoven cannot admit of any kind of liberties being taken with his great works; and how great are the concertos we have mentioned need hardly be said. When Beethoven is the composer, one wants rather to think of Beethoven than of his interpreter; and this Herr von Bülow will not invariably allow. When he is engaged upon Beethoven we are compelled to think of the player rather than of the composer. When we are treated to a concerto by Henselt or Rubinstein, it is really a matter of little consequence, so long as the performer is able to master with ease and fluency the difficulties their works present; and that Herr von Bülow does this—in short, has them at his entire command—few would be prepared to deny. At his "Recitals" Herr von Bülow has played music of all schools and styles; and the names we chiefly miss from his programmes are those of Weber and Mendelssohn. We presume that such men as Dussek, Woelfl, Hummel, Moscheles, Hiller, Heller, Sterndale Bennett, &c., do not come within the category of Herr von Bülow's musical heroes; at the same time, we must confess that we should greatly have preferred an occasional excerpt from one of these to several pieces which have been allowed to figure in his programmes—such, for instance, as Venezia e Napoli of Liszt, which, apart from the mechanical difficulties it presents, is little better than a heap of incoherent passages. Then, again, why does not Herr von Bülow take John Sebastian Bach from the pure well of John Sebastian Bach's own genius, instead of giving us "transcriptions," and so forth, of that mighty master?

In the programme of the first Recital were included, besides selections from Schumann and Chopin, two of Beethoven's sonatas—the sonata in E flat, No. 3, and last of the series Op. 31, and the sonata in A flat, Op. 110. In the rendering of both of these there was much of which we found it difficult unconditionally to approve. The contrasts, in our judgment, were too frequent and too abrupt. This was particularly noticeable in the opening allegro of the first-named sonata, where now and then the "sforzandi" were in anything but good keeping with the nature of a movement which is one of the most quietly humorous ever written. In the sonata, Op. 110, the finale is a mixture of recitative, quite in the dramatic style, with fugue of the most ingenious construction. Herr von Bülow's idea of fugue playing seems to be that the theme is everything, and that the accessories are comparatively of little account. This was remarkable also to some degree in his execution of J. S. Bach's Fuga Chromatica, which he played at the Philharmonic Concert. The theme comes out with splendid emphasis from his fingers, but the rest is made more or less subordinate; and this surely could not have been the idea of Bach and Beethoven, otherwise they would hardly have submitted their themes to such varied and elaborate counterpoint. That the leading subject should everywhere, and under every condition of treatment, be heard clearly and distinctly, is unquestionable; but that the other parts which give interest to its development are of almost equal importance is no less a fact. In other respects, Herr von Bülow's reading of Bach's music is very grand, so much so that we should like to hear him play a good many fugues of Bach precisely as Bach wrote them. We do not see what is gained by "transcribing" pedal fugues written expressly for the organ, because no pair of hands can impart the same effect to them as the two hands and two feet for which they were originally intended. The Fantasia and Fuga Chromatica, not intended for the organ, is so wonderfully effective as Bach himself composed it, that we can see no valid cause for rendering it more mechanically difficult. Herr von Bülow's performance of Schumann's music is remarkably striking, as was proved, especially at his first "Recital," in the Carnival a Vienne. With Chopin we find he makes too many liberties of accent, and, as the phrase is, "tempo rubato." Although Chopin's waltzes, tarantellas, and mazurkas are not of the ordinary sort, it is still supposed that they can be danced to. If not, why should names and titles, each individually characteristic, be assigned to them? Chopin, if we may credit Liszt, used to make the Polish ladies dance "vertiginously" to his music; and Herr von Bülow might do the same if he would adhere more strictly to the measure. In all other respects, he plays Chopin's music in first-rate style, some of his contrasts from loud to soft, especially when he employs the minor pedal, being singularly agreeable and effective.

Not to go further into detail, however, at these "Recitals," Herr von Bülow has played five sonatas of Beethoven, including some of the most difficult, viz.—Les Adieux, L'Absence, et Le Retour (Op. 81), the Sonata Op. 110, and the Sonata Op. 111, last, and excepting the B flat, Op. 106 (which all these great "wonder pianists" seem instinctively to avoid), most difficult of them all; three of the great organ pedal fugues of J. S. Bach ("transcribed" by Liszt); besides no end of works of less importance, though still important, in so far as difficulty is concerned, by Schumann, Liszt, Chopin, Brahms, Scarlatti, Rheinberger, Gotthard, Joachim Raff, and Schubert (a waltz from the Soirées de Vienne, "illustrated by" Liszt, but which had better have been left to its own engaging self). There was one little bit of Mozart (the well-known "minuet and gigue"); Weber and Mendelssohn, as we have hinted, being left in the cold.

The simple fact of all the pieces we have referred to being played from memory speaks highly for the musical ability of Herr von Bülow, who, if not a Liszt—"Liszt Alexander," as Dr. Ferdinand Hiller dubs him in one of his masterly and instructive essays—a Tausig, or a Rubinstein, is, in his peculiar way, one of the foremost players of his time. His performances, thoroughly appreciated and cordially received, must certainly rank among the chief events of the present musical season. That Herr von Bülow is of the Liszt school, and occasionally treats the pianoforte as though it were his enemy, rather than as though it were his confidential friend, is undeniable; he is nevertheless, in his way, a great and original artist.

Breslau.—Herr Schwemer, the present manager of the Stadttheater, cannot be accused of being deficient in energy. Since the 1st October last, he has produced 30 different operas, in a very complete and satisfactory manner. This is no mean feat, when we recollect that, in consequence of the destruction by fire of the old theatre, everything, scenery, dresses, decorations, properties, and appointments, had to be supplied afresh.

Wiesbaden.—The grand concerts of the ensuing season will, according to present arrangements, take place on the following dates: 9th June, 30th June, 7th July, 21st July, and 4th August. There is also to be a grand concert at the time of the races.

CHORAL FESTIVAL AT KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL.

(From the "Cambridge Express," May 24.)

A choral festival at Cambridge should be a success. Scarcely in another town in England could such a force be found of people engaged in the practice of church music; and when it is remembered that the resources of Cambridge formed only a part of those employed in King's College Chapel on Tuesday week last, it will be seen that an opportunity for the hearing of English Church music was afforded such as does not present itself every day.

The doors of the Chapel were opened by a quarter-past one, and by two o'clock the building was full. As the prelude, Mr. C. V. Stamford, organist at Trinity College, played one of Handel's concertos, and proceeded from this to a chorale of Bach, on which he extemporized, so as to combine it with subjects from the concerto. The service then commenced. The General Confession was intoned after the "Ely Use," and Tallis's setting of the Preces was employed. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were sung to Dr. Garrett's fine setting in F, the effect of which was admirable, and must have caused much pleasure to the composer, who conducted throughout, a stand being placed between the choir stalls. The anthem after the Third Collect was Purcell's "O sing unto the Lord," conducted by Dr. Garrett, and accompanied by Mr. Amps, who had acted as organist up to this point. After the service a number of anthems were sung, the first being an extract from Professor Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria, namely, the tenor air, "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him," and the following chorus. The tenor solo was beautifully sung by Mr. Cummings, who visited Cambridge for the occasion. The anthem was conducted by its composer, whom it was pleasant to see taking a part in the musical doings of the town. The organ part was played by Dr. Garrett. This was followed by Orlando Gibbons' elaborate and difficult "Hosanna" in five parts, sung without accompaniment. The music of Gibbons, prince of the English school of church music, is specially appropriate in King's College Chapel, where for some time he acted as organist, and succeeded in so enchanting his contemporaries that it was (somewhat audaciously) recorded of him in his epitaph, that he was the "Composer of many hymns which sound his praise no less than that of his Maker." It must, however, be confessed that to some extent this anthem missed its effect. It is perhaps to be doubted whether King's College Chapel, so magnificent a place in some respects for a choral festival, is quite the best spot for hearing music which demands extreme clearness of effect as its first condition of success. After this we had Sir John Goss's Thanksgiving Anthem, composed on the recovery of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, "The Lord is my strength." It was conducted by the composer, and accompanied on the organ by Mr. E. Silver, who performed his honourable task in a way most creditable to so young a musician. The bass solo was sung by Mr. Briggs, of Windsor Chapel Royal, and Mr. De Lacey, of St. Paul's Cathedral choir, together, but with so much precision and distinctness as to impose on the greater part of the congregation who were unaware that more than one voice was singing. Next was sung, unaccompanied, Farrant's well-known anthem, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake." It was conducted by Dr. Garrett, and produced an effect quite equal to anything else performed. It was followed by Sir George Elvey's fine anthem, "In that day," conducted by the composer. The tenor solo was sung by Mr. Cummings. It was accompanied (at the special request of Sir George Elvey) by Mr. Amps, who, with a self-renunciation one would wish to see more often exercised, left himself but a small share in the performances of the day.

After this a collection was made in behalf of the Choir Benevolent Fund, in aid of which the Festival was held. During the collection Mr. Stamford played, as a voluntary, Beethoven's Andante in F, with that combination of refined conception and masterly execution that we have been accustomed to look for from him at the Trinity Organ Recitals. The amount collected was £115 7s. 11½d. After the collection the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung, accompanied by Mr. Dewberry, and the service then closed with the benediction. As a concluding voluntary, Dr. Bunnett, of Norwich, played the overture to Samson, afterwards extemporising and concluding with "God Save the Queen." The choir consisted of more than 30 trebles, 15 altos, 22 tenors, and 22 basses, of which Cambridge contributed all the trebles but two, 10 altos, 18 tenors, and 13 basses. Subscriptions for the Choir Benevolent Fund will be gladly received by Mr. Piper, Local Secretary, Librarian of King's College.

CHARLES HALLÉ'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

The classical concerts now being given on Friday afternoons, in St. James's Hall, illustrate the law of growth which affects everything having in it the elements of true vitality. At first they were no more than their name indicates—that is to say, Mr. Hallé, as sole entertainer, played at each a selection of music from the exhaustless repertory of his instrument. The Recitals might have gone on for ever in this fashion without lacking a fit and numerous audience; but they were too full of healthy life not to develop into something larger and more comprehensive. The next stage associated a violin with the pianoforte, thus bringing within reach the abundant store of works composed for the two instruments in common. Here, also, the recitals might have paused; but, this season, they have taken another step forward, and become, in effect, a summer duplicate of Mr. Chappell's justly-renowned "Popular Concerts." The programmes now include not only pianoforte solos, and pianoforte and violin duets, but works wherein Mr. Hallé's instrument is associated with several others—primus inter pares. That the efficiency of the enlarged performance is guaranteed by the names of such artists as Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti need not be said, nor is there any necessity for insisting upon the claims of the Recitals in their new form. We cannot, however, permit their significance to run the risk of being overlooked. These Friday afternoon concerts have nothing of the ordinary fashionable morning entertainment about them, and present very few attractions for those who are not earnest amateurs of good music. The programmes are uncompromising to the last degree; the artists rigidly avoid the taint of "sensationalism;" and the audience are called upon for downright hard work if they would profit to the utmost by what is done. This being the case, it says no little for the popularity of high-class music when a lengthy series of such concerts can flourish in the midst of the lighter attractions of a busy and brilliant season. The result is one for hearty congratulation, and, let us add, for grateful remembrance of the services rendered by Mr. Hallé, through a long course of years, in bringing the result about. Mr. Hallé has done an artist's best work for art in this country, unaided by loud-voiced pretensions, which always impose upon the crowd; by personal affectedness, which can hide shortcomings from the purblind; or by any kind or degree of "sensation." He has laboured steadily on, satisfied to put forward classical works, with reverent care for their integrity, and content to enjoy whatever honours belong to the conscientious and able interpreter. It is such as Mr. Hallé who best advance the cause of art; and not those who drive about with the great masters tied to their chariot-wheels, like conquered kings.

A conspicuous feature of the present Recitals, and one of rare educational value, is the number of modern works presented. Mr. Hallé seems bent upon giving the German composers of our day a fair hearing, so that, if their claims be rejected, rejection shall not be a consequence of lacking knowledge. Since the series began, we have had Brahms' pianoforte trio in B flat major (Op. 8), the same author's pianoforte quartet in G minor (Op. 25), his quintet in F minor (Op. 34), and Raff's pianoforte trio in G major (Op. 112). These are admitted to be among the best productions of their school, and it is no small advantage to have such as these shown to perfection by means of perfect execution, and shown side by side with works which hold classic rank. Obviously, however, the main attraction of the Recitals is found in the music by the greater masters, with which every programme abounds. We cannot attempt even to mention the compositions belonging to this class that have already been performed; but a fair idea of each group may be gathered from the programme of Friday next. In that well-arranged scheme are Mendelssohn's pianoforte quartet in F minor, Schumann's trio in G minor, Weber's sonata in E minor for pianoforte alone, Beethoven's sonata in A major for violin and piano; and a Suite de pièces in G major, by Bach. Truly a "feast of fat things," of which there should be, as there, doubtless, will be, many partakers.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

(From the "Globe.")

These performances, to which we have already more than once called the attention of our readers as representing music in the "London International Exhibition," are continued daily. The taste and judgment exercised in the selection of the pieces, and the efficiency with which they are executed, are alike undiminished; while the number of auditors, to judge by the appearance of the hall when we were present, if not yet what it should be, is steadily increasing. We know no place or occasion where or when an hour's music, neither more nor less, can be more thoroughly enjoyed. We had a symphony and two overtures—not to speak of two songs—all three, though for different reasons, of great interest, performed by an orchestra thoroughly competent by its number and efficiency for their interpretation. The symphony was the Historical (Op. 116) of Spohr. No more striking example than this work presents of the mis-judgment of an artist of his own powers can be found in the whole range of art. As is well said in the "Analytical Programme," Spohr's "own genius was so distinctive and individual in all its modifications, his artistic sympathies were so limited, and his knowledge so circumscribed, as to make him almost ludicrously unfit for such a task" as the composition of a symphony, in which, without being slavishly imitated or literally transcribed, the "manners" of a succession of composers, whose careers extend over more than a century, should be unmistakably and yet gracefully indicated. The egotism of musical composers is proverbial; but Spohr seems literally to have passed his life in self-contemplation. So narrow was the range of his reading, that he is recorded to have astounded a pianist, who played him one of the best known sonatas of Beethoven, by the question, "Had he (the pianist) composed much in that style?" His critical powers are best measured by the fact of his condemnation of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, which he tells us in his autobiography, he "did not think much of," or something to the same effect. Nevertheless, if neither "Haydn and Mozart," nor "Beethoven," nor the "modern school" are very happily presented in the Historical Symphony, Spohr is; and very well worth presenting he is generally found. The work abounds in fresh and beautiful ideas turned to excellent account. The only really objectionable thing about it is its title. Of the two overtures performed, one was the well-known Fidelio (in E, No. 4) of Beethoven, the other the Andromeda of Mr. Henry Gadsby, first performed at the Crystal Palace at the beginning of the present year. This work, with which and the story that is said to have inspired it, it is not difficult to trace the connection, is one of the most promising—nay, one of the best—of its class which we owe to the rising generation of English composers. The subjects, without being far-fetched or determinedly eccentric, are original, and they are wrought into a composition alike coherent in its plan and interesting in its details. The instrumentation, too, without being overcrowded, is for the most part well-knit, its general compactness being relieved by combination, wherein the fewness of the parts is made up by the contrapuntal skill with which they are adjusted.

The audience, if somewhat small—in reference, at least, to the auditorium—was choice and attentive, including, among many well-known professors and amateurs, H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh.

SALZBURG.—The directors of the Mozart Foundation (Mozart Stiftung) lately requested Madame Adelina Patti to sing at a grand concert to be given for the benefit of the institution. Madame Patti wrote in reply to the President, Baron Carl von Sterneck, saying that "she should feel especial satisfaction in singing for an institution established in memory of the great Mozart," and that she left it to the Committee to select for the concert some one of the large towns in which she had engagements. The Committee think of giving the concert in London.

STOCKHOLM.—Handel's oratorio of Samson, performed last year at Upsala, under the direction of M. Josephson, conductor of the University, has just been given here, under the same gentleman, with extraordinary success.

MODENA.—A new opera, La Statua di Carne, by Signor Marchiò, has been successfully produced at the Teatro Goldoni.

THE JUBILEE SINGERS.

The appearance in England of a band of real negro minstrels, or, to speak by the card, of minstrels all of whom have African blood in their veins, cannot fail to excite much interest, especially when the circumstances of their visit are taken into account. An authoritative statement of those circumstances is as follows:—

"This band of black vocalists consists of seven young ladies and four young gentlemen, nearly all of them emancipated slaves. They are students connected with Fisk University, one of seven chartered institutions established in the States, recently slave states, by the American Missionary Association. The aim of this university is to give the freed men a higher and Christian education, so that the most gifted among them can be fitted to become teachers and leaders of their race in America, the West India Islands, and Africa. They come to England under the direct auspices of the American Missionary Association, auxiliary to which is the Freedmen's Mission Aid Society of London. They sing the old slave songs, composed by their fathers in the darkest hours of their bondage, whose plaintive melodies and sad repinings have touched the hearts of thousands. For the past year and a half they have been singing before the Christian public of the Northern States, and have been received wherever they have gone with great favour. These young people are endeavouring to raise money to build a 'Jubilee Hall,' the first permanent building of Fisk University. Eight of the fourteen thousand pounds required have already been secured through their efforts, and they now visit England at the earnest solicitation of many friends, hoping thereby to complete the needed amount."

Every one will wish success to an enterprise so laudable, and will give the representatives of a long oppressed race a hearty welcome to the land of Wilberforce. But our special object in noticing them here is not to discuss the purpose for which the Jubilee Singers have come, so much as to ask attention for the music they sing. That music, let us say at the outset, is but ephemeral, having taken its peculiar characteristics from a state of things now happily ended for ever. The slave songs of the United States, especially those of a religious cast, bear the impress of slavery upon them. In such wild strains as he could invent, the negro found comfort amid the hardships of his position; and it was natural that, living in a world which treated him so badly, he should cling with passionate fondness to a religion that spoke of a place where sorrow cannot enter. "All the religious slave songs," says an American writer, "are valuable, as an expression of the character and life of the race, now playing such a conspicuous part in our history. The wild, sad strains tell, as the sufferers themselves could, of crushed hopes, keen sorrow, and a dull, daily misery, which covered them as hopelessly as the fog from the rice swamps. On the other hand, the words breathe a trusting faith in rest for the future—in "Canaan's air and happy land, to which their eyes seemed constantly turned." A glance at the titles of some of the songs gives an idea of the mixture of sadness and hope pervading them. Here are a few:—

"I hear from Heaven to-day;" "The trouble of the world;" "Not weary yet;" "Hunting for a city;" "Heaven bell a-ringing;" "I know when I am going home;" "My body rock 'long fever;" "Join the angel band;" "I want to go home;" "Lord, make me more patient;" "Nobody knows the trouble I've had;" "Hold out to the end;" "Jesus, won't you come by-and-bye?" "What a trying time;" "Almost over;" "I'm going home;" "My Father, how long?" "This is the trouble of the world;" "God gor plenty o' room."

If true pathos can be found anywhere it is in these records of a sad and weary time, and the simple titles we have quoted are the best commentary upon the system which, falling, dragged down lives by the hundred thousand, and treasure by the million Slavery having passed away, the slave songs will soon follow it. The American writer above quoted says:—

"It is already becoming difficult to obtain these songs. The 'spirituals' (religious songs) are going out of use on the plantations superseded by the new style of religious music closely imitated from the white people, which is solemn, dull, and nasal, consisting in repeating two lines of a hymn, and then singing them, and then two more, ad infinitum. This style of proceeding they evidently consider the more dignified style of the two, as being a closer imitation of white genteel worship—having in it about as little soul as most stereotyped religious forms of well-instructed congregations."

It is with the last fading music of slavery that the Jubilee Singers have come to this country, and whoever desires to make its acquaintance should take the only chance likely to be afforded. It is not possible to exaggerate the odd mixture of the grotesque and the poetical which distinguishes the religious slave-song. No description can convey any idea of it, and we must perforce rely upon quotation. Here is one ditty:—

Digitized by Google

"No more rain fall for to wet you,
Hallelu.
No more sun shine for to burn you,
No more parting in de Kingdom,
No more back-biting in de Kingdom,
Every day shall be Sunday."

Here is another :—

"O, Lord. I want some valiant soldier
To help me bear the cross,
For I weep, I weep, I can't hold out;
If any mercy, Lord, O pity poor me."

But quaintest of all is the subjoined :—

"Bendin' knees a achin'; body rack'd wid pain,
I wish I was a child of God,
I'd git home bime-by.
O, yonder's my ole mudder, been a waggin' at de hill so long,
It's about time she cross over,
Git home bime-by.
O, hear dat lumberin' thunder, A-roll from do' to do',
A callin' de people home to God;
Dey'll git home bime-by.
O, see dat forked lightnin', A-jump from cloud to cloud,
A pickin' up God's chil'n;
Dey'll git home bime-by."

After each verse of the foregoing, a chorus is sung :—

"Keep prayin', I do believe
We're a long time wagging o' de crossing;
Keep prayin', I do believe
We'll git home to heaven bime-by."

These examples will suffice to show the curious interest connected with the religious slave song, an interest legitimately arising not merely from the circumstance of slavery, but from the light thrown upon a race whose greatest part in the world's history has yet to be played.

The music attached to the songs resembles the words in its irregularity and defiance of rule; resembles the words also in its quaint charm and novelty of style. Like Topsey, these melodies "growed," making their way direct from the unsophisticated tunefulness of the poor people. "I asked one of the most intelligent of the blacks," writes another American author, "where they got these songs." "Dey make 'em, sah." "How do they make them?" After a pause, evidently casting about for an explanation, he said :—

"I'll tell you. It's dis way. My master call me up and order me a short peck of corn and a hundred lash. My friends see it, and is sorry for me. When dey come to the praise-meeting dat night dey sing about it. Some's very good singers, and know how; and dey work it in—work it in, you know, till dey get it right, and dat's de way."

What sort of melodies are thus "worked in" can only be shown by the aid of music type, and it must suffice to state here that, while always original and striking, they are often full of deepest feeling. To the musician they present quite a study of new rhythms from which many a useful hint may be derived.

The foregoing remarks are made solely to create an intelligent interest in the music which the Jubilee Singers have brought to us. Writing to England in advance of the Minstrels' coming, Henry Ward Beecher said :—

"You will hear from them the wild slave songs, some of which seem like the inarticulate wails of breaking hearts made dumb by slavery. You will hear the plantation songs—in short, the inner life of slave hearts expressed in music. We are not ashamed to send this band to our British brethren, and we are sure that their music will strike a chord which will vibrate long after their songs shall cease."

Mr. Ward Beecher was quite justified in his confidence as regards the capacity of the singers, nearly all of whom have good voices, while long practice in working together has given their performances a unity and precision leaving nothing to desire. The audience assembled in Hanover Square Rooms on Thursday last week were evidently delighted with what they heard, and sat out to the end a succession of "spirituals," relieved only by very occasional songs and duets. Sometimes the vocalists massed themselves closely together; at other times they sat in the familiar manner of the Christy's and chanted a kind of dialogue between solo and chorus. "O brethren and sisters, how do you do?"—sang one of the young ladies, all responding in unison and in nearly monotonous cadence, "There's a love-feast in Heaven by-and-bye." "And does your love continue true?" again queried the solo, to which the chorus responded as before; and so on to the end. These are the songs which create the greatest interest, and are best received. But the whole entertainment is unique and curious to the last degree. Other concerts will be given from time to time, and all who take an interest in a strange and transitory phase of rudimentary art among a decidedly musical people should make a point of hearing the Jubilee Singers.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

The building which crowns Muswell Hill, the most commanding height on the northern side of London, has been substantially built by Messrs. Kelk and Lucas, from the designs of Messrs. Meeson and Johnson, the architects, and is grandly placed in a park 220 acres in extent. The site, favoured as it is by nature in a very extraordinary degree, has been turned to the best account of skilful landscape gardening by Mr. Alexander M'Kenzie, to whose knowledge and experience the parks of Finsbury and Southwark, the ornamental gardens of the Thames Embankment, and many other public pleasure grounds, owe their chief beauties. Raised to such an altitude that it overlooks twenty miles of uninterrupted landscape to the North and East, and, in clear weather, can sight the towers and glittering walls of the Crystal Palace on the other side of London, the structure is a conspicuous object. Thirty-seven villages, each distinguishable by its church, can be counted from that fine elevation, which is as far from the centre of the town as is the famous House of Glass on Penge Hill. It is remarkable indeed that a circle struck by a pair of compasses, with the inner leg fixed on a point at Charing Cross, would intersect both buildings at a radius of six miles. With an extreme length of 900 feet, and a width of 430 feet, the main hall, or nave, affords ample space for promenading, for flower shows, and for festivals of all kinds. There is, moreover, the additional area of three transepts, over the central one being a well-lit cupola 220 feet high, with a diameter of 170 feet. In this transept will take place all great musical performances, the organ being one of the most magnificent ever built. A theatre, with a stage as large as Drury Lane, having a width of 85 feet, has been designed and constructed by Messrs. Grieve and Sons, the well-known scenic artists. Over the proscenium is a large painting by Mr. John Absolon; and the modelled ornamentation is of a piece with the architecture of the Palace itself, being solidly constructed, and entirely free from the ordinary look of temporary fittings. On either side the proscenium appropriate statuary has been placed by Mr. Brucciani, who has ranged along the whole vista of the building copies of the finest sculpture that adorns the palaces and musuems of Rome, Florence, and other cities. Balancing the theatre, which is in the eastern part of the nave, is a concert-hall, not yet completed, at the western end of the building. This apartment will hold three thousand persons; and the floor is scooped out, like three sides of a dish, so as to have a rising ground in all directions from the orchestra. A second organ, of smaller compass, is being built for the concert-room by Mr. Willis.

WEIMAR.—The Abbate Franz Liszt's oratorio of Christus was to be performed, on the 29th ult., at 6 o'clock, p.m., in the Town Church, under the direction of the composer himself. The solos were to be sustained by Madame von Milde, Mdlle. Dotter, Herren Borchers and von Milde. The chorus was to consist of the Weimar Singacademie and Academical Vocal Union, of the Jena Singacademie and Vocal Union, and of some members of the Erfurt Union. The orchestra was to be made up of the Grand-Ducal orchestra, of members of the Sonderhausen orchestra, and of pupils of the Orchestral School. The following are the principal features of the oratorio :—First Part. Christmas Oratorio. 1. Introduction: "Rorate Cœli desuper et Nubes pluant justum; aperiatur Terra, et germinet Salvatorem. 2. Annunciation of the Angels. 3. Stabat Mater speciosa. 4. Performance of the Shepherds in the Manger. 5. The three holy Kings: "Et ecce Stella quam viderunt." Second Part. After Epiphania. 6. The Beatification. 7. The Foundation of the Church: "Tu es Petrus." 8. Pater Noster. 9. The Miracle: "Et ecce Motus magnus factus est in Maribus." 10. The Entry into Jerusalem: "Hosanna, benedictus qui venit in Nomine Domini." "Third Part. The Passion and Resurrection. 11. "Tristis est Anima mea." 12. Stabat Mater dolorosa. 13. O, Filii et Filæ! 14. "Resurrexit." "Christus vincit."

PAULINE LUCCA IN CHICAGO.

(From "The Chicago Times.")

The tide of popular enthusiasm over the appearances of Madame Lucca was at its highest flow at yesterday afternoon's matinée presentation of the Daughter of the Regiment. This fervour of admiration, which has been on the increase during the whole of the visit which the cantatrice has just made us, called out an audience by all odds the most enthusiastic and demonstrative of the season. The Daughter of the Regiment, like all of Donizetti's operas, affords a wonderful field for the exhibition of pure dramatic talent, and it furthermore requires the almost constant presence of the prima donna upon the stage—two facts which, when we consider that Madame Lucca was the prima donna of yesterday's representation, will sufficiently account for the well-nigh crazy pitch of enthusiasm reached by the audience. Madame Lucca, too, surpassed herself in sprightliness and good humour, and was applauded to the echo, and at the close of the first act she was called before the curtain three times, amid a tumult of cheers. At the opening of the second act, in the "music lesson" scene, Madame Lucca introduced "Mein Lied," in German, and "Home, sweet Home," in English. The audience, which was largely composed of Germans, received "Mein Lied" with wild enthusiasm, and followed it with a shower of bouquets. "Home, sweet Home" was sung with a depth of feeling and delicacy of expression, almost beyond rivalry. This, too, was received with demonstrations of delight, in which the entire audience joined.

As soon as the applause which followed "Home, Sweet Home" had subsided, Mr. Louis Wahl stepped upon the stage, and, in the name of the citizens of Chicago, presented Mdme. Lucca with a magnificent diamond cross, assuring her that it was a tribute rendered not merely in recognition of her genius, but as a feeble acknowledgment of her kindness of heart, and the generous impulses which have marked her bearing towards our citizens during her recent visits. Mdme. Lucca affected to tears, bowed with unfeigned emotion, and replied as follows:—

"Kind friends: I feel so happy to receive this gift that my feelings quite overcome me—to receive such a token, such a beautiful token, of your esteem. I hope to return to you again next fall, and will then try to convince you of my gratitude. Again, a thousand thanks, and prosperity to Chicago!"

The gift is a Maltese cross, the centre stone being a large and beautiful diamond, accompanied by nine other smaller ones, mounted in elegant and massive plain gold setting. It is one inch in length, and three-quarters of an inch in breadth, and cost $1,000 The cross was worn during the remainder of the performance by the fair recipient, and was, of course, the centre of attraction to the lady matinée-goers. The closing act of the opera was given with the same vivacity and good humour. Vizzani's Tonio, and Ronconi's Sulpizio, as well as the numerous and stirring choruses, were given in unexceptionable style, although the effulgence of the greater light gave the lesser ones small chance to shine.

The opera week which has just closed has been one of unprecedented success. Few of those who, night by night, sit in front of the curtain, applauding and censuring, can form an idea of the labour, the tact, or the expense demanded of a manager. When, therefore, he shows a liberality in his appointments, and a desire to support his leading stars with the best talent, he deserves success. In bringing together two such artists as Lucca and Kellogg he has shown an intimate acquaintance with the popular taste, and a laudable desire to please all fancies. Madame Lucca is, undoubtedly, the ablest lyric artist who has visited these shores for years. She is, as yet, in the hey-day of her prime, and has certainly not touched the "summit of her greatness." There are triumphs yet in store for her grander than any she has yet achieved. She has won the hearts of our people, as well by the nobility of her genius as by an inexpressibly charming naiveté peculiarly her own. The various rôles in which she has appeared have all, without exception, been admirably suited to bring out the versatility and range of her wonderful powers. In the repertory presented she has simply followed the bent of her genius, and fallen into the niche which nature intended for her. In the delineation of tender feeling as in M. Gounod's touching and admirable Faust, or those sparkling touches so beautifully illustrated in Don Giovanni, and the Daughter of the Regiment, she cannot be surpassed. Miss Kellogg, by her splendid vocalization and improved acting, has won "golden opinions from all sorts of people." Her appearance in Don Giovanni was a decided triumph, and considering that she has had to undergo the trying ordeal of instinctive comparison with one of Europe's most trained and gifted artists, it is but justice to say that the United States has no reason to feel ashamed of its prima donna. Of the other members of the troupe we have already spoken in the highest terms. Yesterday afternoon, being the final performance, a select and fashionable audience assembled at the matinée to take a parting look at the fascinating German, and to listen to the familiar and always welcome music of Donizetti's beautiful opera. Mdme. Lucca could not have chosen a better rôle in which to leave a lasting impression behind her and to say farewell. Marie is in every particular admirably suited to her powers. The Daughter of the Regiment has ever been a popular opera with the class of artists to which Mdme. Lucca belongs. It is one of the earliest efforts of Malibran, and in the character of Marie Jenny Lind first showed the Continental world whether the criticism of Garcia—that she had no voice—was correct. To those who remember her thrilling and bird-like notes the personation of Lucca might lose a little of its charm; still there is in Lucca what there was not in Jenny Lind—the soul of an actress. The magnetic power which she throws into all her personations produces an effect greater than if she were to introduce the florid ornamentation of Malibran, or the marvellous and almost superhuman flights of the Swedish Nightingale. She sung "Mein Lieb" as only a German with such a voice could sing it, and in "Home, sweet Home," so familiar and so dear, she sent a thrill home to every heart, and brought down such a burst of applause that the song must have brought delight even to herself. At the close of the matinée there was a little drama, in which Lucca laid aside the actress and played the woman with such feeling and grace that there was scarcely a dry eye in the house. It was as good as an opera to hear those pretty foreign accents speak their little speech, and promise to return again, and when she uttered the energetic wish, "Success to Chicago," there was not a heart in the audience which did not wish the fascinating little woman "God speed." The remarks of Mr. Wahl were brief and well chosen, and in the third act Madame Lucca wore the beautiful diamond cross which must ever be to her a souvenir of the love she leaves behind her in the Western metropolis.

LIVERPOOL AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

A correspondent with the signature of "Crotchet" writes to the Liverpool Porcupine as follows:—

"Your London letter writer last week expressed his delight at 'the efforts which are being made to insure a proper representation' of Liverpool at the national musical competition of the choirs in the Crystal Palace in July next. From time to time we have heard of these grand contests, but have seen or heard little of the practical results attained. Considering that this competition is supposed to be a national effort, not only are there very few competitors, but those who enter the lists are generally below the standard which, under the circumstances, might be expected to be attained. I presume that in the institution of these annual gatherings one idea was to develop local talent which might otherwise never be heard of, and by the diffusion of a spirit of general emulation to stimulate choirs and choral societies to the cultivation of part-singing. It is in no bickering spirit I would inquire how much (or how little) result satisfactory to the best interests of the musical art has followed these so-called national competitions hitherto?

"Liverpool, it seems, is about to send up some eighty singers to take part in a choral contest. But have any efforts whatever been made to insure that 'proper representation' of the town of which your London correspondent speaks? Is Mr. Sanders's choir any more the embodiment and concentration of Liverpool musical excellence than were the immortal trio of Tooley Street tailors the accredited ambassadors of Great Britian? How and why have these representatives of Liverpool at the Crystal Palace musical congress been chosen? Are they not self-elected? Do they represent more than a section or a clique of Liverpool singers?

"In my humble opinion local competitions should precede any national contest. Steps should be taken to secure the very best article that a town can produce before its musical contribution is put in comparison with that of its neighbours. Mr. Sanders's singers have never been shown to be superior to any other choir; and they cannot be fairly representative, if no effort has been made to call the best voices from the several local choirs of every denomination. The promised public rehearsal of the Liverpool competitors may prove that the self-constituted champions of the divine art here have some warranty for engaging in the contest, but it would be better had the singers undertaking to sustain Liverpool's musical repute been tried in the crucible of local competition, for the encouragement of which, doubtless, handsome prizes would always be forthcoming, and there would never be a lack of efficient aspirants to honours. The result of such healthy contests would not only have an immediate influence on art locally, but, by furnishing the worthiest exemplars of the town's musical standing, would raise the standard of excellence at the national gatherings annually in London."

THIRD EDITION OF "ANOTHER WORLD."

In 1 vol. Post 8vo, price 12s.,

"ANOTHER WORLD;"

OR,

FRAGMENTS FROM THE STAR CITY OF MONTALLUYAH.

BY HERMES.

"A very curious book, very cleverly written. . . . Likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind."—Saturday Review.

"Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to this sublinary sphere as to those of another world. . . . Of his powers of narrative and expression there can be no doubt."—Morning Post.

"A romance of science. . . . Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."—Sunday Times.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

DEATH.

On the 3rd inst., suddenly, Mr. JOHN GOODMAN, formerly of Great Marlborough Street, aged 67.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AMATEUR.—Herr Jacques Rosenthal (formerly concert-meister at Hamburgh), has been for some years settled in this country. At the Crystal Palace Saturday Concert, February 15th, 1868, he appeared, with great honour and success, as a solo violinist, selecting for his début the first movement of Vieuxtemps' masterly Concerto in E.

DR. BLUFF.—There is a symphony by Haydn to which the nickname of "Jupiter" was given: but Haydn was no more answerable for it than was Mozart for the same nickname being fixed upon his great Symphony in C. In his other speculations Dr. Bluff is altogether misinformed; and one of his queries about a certain English artist seems to us little better than idiotic.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1873.

GRUMBLING is admitted on all hands to be an Englishman's privilege, and it may also be the safety-valve through which the spleen of his nature escapes harmlessly. Nothing exists in vain, not even the most disagreeable monster that hides in subterranean caves; and an Englishman's tendency to grumble, we may depend upon it, is adapted to do good on English soil. It keeps us all up to the mark, and encourages us to strive after something better than that we have by a continual pointing out of shortcomings. But always grumbling cannot be good, because it cannot be true. The worst condition of things is not unmixed evil, and we are wise sometimes to look upon the "bright side" which the good in it presents. Suppose we do this, in brief fashion, with regard to music. No doubt there is plenty to grumble at, if we felt in grumbling mood. The "Millennium" of Art is yet a long way off, and with the divine essence of music is still mixed up a large proportion of more earthly and grosser matter. We need not fear, therefore, that the grumbler's occupation will be gone for some time to come; but all the while there is much—and that much increasing year by year—adapted to call forth thankfulness instead of complaint. We will glance for a moment at this class of undoubted facts,

It has often been urged that composers who strive after legitimate fame in the highest walks of art receive no encouragement in this country. That some sort of reason exists for this we will not pretend to deny. The classical composer, for example, must not expect to make a fortune out of his classical compositions. For bread and cheese he needs to depend upon the class of writings vulgarly known as "pot-boilers," and if he can write good "pot-boilers" little difficulty will be found in adding an occasional onion to his fare. Having the necessaries represented by bread and cheese, and the luxuries represented by the onion, it is surely not too much to expect the genuine artist-composer to work somewhat for his art, with reference rather to glory than to guineas. If so disposed, present appearances go to show that he need not despair of opportunities and patronage. In proof, we need but mention a single fact, which is that more new works are now being prepared under the highest auspices than at any previous time in the history of English music. Mr. Sullivan is writing an oratorio, "The Light of the World;" Mr. Randegger has in hand a cantata, "Fridolin;" Mr. Schira has finished a cantata, "The Lord of Burleigh;" all for the Festival at Birmingham. Mr. G. A. Macfarren's "John the Baptist," is engaged for the Festival at Bristol; Mr. Henry Smart's "Jacob," for that at Glasgow; and the "Hagar" of Sir Gore Ouseley, for that at Hereford. In addition, the "Lazarus" of Mr. J. F. Barnett is promised at a concert given by the new Philharmonic Society. This England of ours may not be a musical country, but we should like to know if any other country in the world can show a like state of things. Seven new works of large dimensions and importance in a single season together make up a great and significant fact. In view of it let us hear no more about want of opportunity and encouragement from ambitious composers. Of course, festival programmes are not open to every man who thinks he can write an oratorio, but the "seven" speak plainly enough to the fact that no man need despair of overcoming whatever obstacles lie outside of himself.

Turning from the creative to the executive branch of our art, we see equal reasons for congratulation. Classical music is fairly in the ascendant. It may be that a vast proportion of those who support classical music with all the zeal of converts merely persuade themselves that they love it; but even so, a great step in advance is made. When people feel that they ought to do such and such things, the time is not far off when they will make the effort, and succeed. At the worst, classical music has reached this stage of its career. The public believe that they are doing the "correct thing" when they patronize it, and every year brings closer at hand the time when an education, begun out of deference to a general sentiment, will terminate in an honest conviction. On every hand there are evidences of such a progress. Classical music pervades our concert-rooms even through the months of the London "season." It is an essential wherever pretensions are made to art. It is to be heard daily at Exhibitions, Crystal Palaces, and other places of amusement or instruction. These are simple facts which do not need a glance down the advertisement columns of the newspapers for proof. Being facts, let us take whatever comfort they are adapted to give, and pause in our grumbling, in order to be thankful. After the "Laus Deo," grumbling may begin again with, perhaps, a trifle of abatement.

LET us all throw physic to the dogs. The doctor's occupation 's gone. There is mourning in Apothecaries' Hall. The British College of Health will sell its stone lion to pay rent, and—in short, it is all up with drugs. Read this extract from Mr. John Ella's Musical Union programme:—

"Contrary to medical advice, I left a sick room an invalid, to assist at the last Musical Union, and returned home convalescent. In November, 1845, at Vienna, under similar circumstances, I attended a most exciting performance of Berlioz's music; the same results!"

Music, long the food of love, is discovered to be medicine for the body. Now is the dawn of a blessed time, when a visit to the Musical Union will cure the bile, when a course of Herr Bülow's playing will be an infallible recipe for neuralgia, and when a musical lecture at the London Institution will act as a powerful emetic. Happy Mr. Ella, who cries "Eureka" to such a "find." He shall have a statue in Leicester Square, representing him as the genius of Music trampling on Professor Holloway, also the late Morrison.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

OUR little friend, the Echo, has perpetrated the following:—

"Of Liszt's Psalm it is difficult to speak after a first hearing. To the unlearned it would appear, doubtless, to be descriptive of a boiling sea after a wreck, with a few drowning men floating about on spars, the drowning men to represent certain fitful gleams of melody, the boiling chaos all the rest. But the attentive, though uninitiated listener, might quickly discern that the XIIIth Psalm is a powerful work, with real intention and meaning, containing passages of that peculiar force and fascination which occur in all Liszt's compositions. Our own experience being that Liszt is almost always oppressive and hopeless at a first hearing, and that he improves after each trial, we are willing to believe that the XIIIth Psalm is no exception to this rule; we shall, therefore, hope to say more about it next time—at present we feel rather deaf, and generally well beaten all over."

So it seems that drowning men represent Liszt's "fitful gleams" of melody, and "boiling chaos" represents "all the rest." We do not wish to disturb this arrangement, but what is "boiling chaos?" Really, if our little friend does not talk more intelligibly, he will deserve to be "beaten all over."

THE Sunday Times thus girded at Hans von Bülow in its latest issue, and àpropos of the latest Philharmonic Concert:—

"The solo performer was Herr Hans von Bülow, who, to the incoherence of his own playing, added the incoherence of Rubinstein's Concerto in G; and what with one and what with the other, the audience got so bemuddled as to take refuge in the delusion that they were all delighted. We cannot describe Rubinstein's music, if music it may be called. It makes the orchestra and pianoforte rave like inarticulate monsters in pain; its progress is by jerks and spasms, it is without form and void of sense. Herr von Bülow played the work as such a work should be played. He flung himself about, flourished his hands, glared now at the orchestra, now at the audience, missed right notes and put wrong ones in their places, and generally demeaned himself as a man might be expected to demean himself much of whose life has been spent in committing to memory the gibberish of the Pythoness calling herself Modern German Music. We devoutly hope Dr. Bülow will take Rubinstein's Concerto back with him; and if he should drop the thing overboard in mid-channel our only regret would be for the fish that happened to swallow it.

MDLLE. ILMA DI MURSKA, we are informed, has declined to play the part of Filina in the Mignon of M. Thomas, now in rehearsal at Her Majesty's Opera. So much the worse for Mr. Mapleson, so much the worse for M. Thomas, so much the worse for Mdlle. di Murska, and so much the better for Mdlle. Christine Nilsson.

Lines for Music.

BELOVED MAY.*

In yon cottage on the mountain,
With creeper covered o'er,
By the gushing, gurgling fountain,
With its melodious roar,
Sheltered by those colossal firs
From summer sun's fierce ray,
Without a form to equal hers,
Lives my beloved May.

There are pansies drest in velvet,
Carnations robed in red,
Lilac bow'd down by dew so wet,
That scarce can lift its head.
Lilies, white as snow that's falling,
In this her garden gay—
But the brightest flow'r that's blooming
Is their fair mistress, May.

The forest birds all know her well,
So kind and good is she;
Her step they instantly can tell,
Her voice they never flee.
About they'll hover at her call,
And warble their sweet lay—
But the blithest bird among them all
Is my young darling, May.

Ah! that cottage is the casket
Wherein my heart is laid,
The jewel rare that's in it set
Is that delightful maid.
Oh, Love! shoot thou thy pow'rful dart,
On this warm summer's day,
At the sole sov'reign of my heart,
That little blossom—May.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The announcement that the first evening concert given by Madame Rebecca Jewell would introduce a new and important work from the pen of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, was in itself sufficient to attract a large and brilliant audience, comprising a considerable proportion of the élite of the musical world, to the Hanover Square Rooms on Saturday evening last. The composition in question consisted of a descriptive pianoforte sonata (Op. 46), entitled "Die Jungfrau von Orleans" (the Maid of Orleans), its interpretation being entrusted to Miss Channell, a student of the Royal Academy of Music, who has already distinguished herself as a pianist of great promise. The sonata is in four movements—the first, the Andante Pastorale, being supposed to depict the peaceful days passed in the fields amongst her flocks by the ill-fated Pucelle; the second, the Allegro Marziale, representing the din and clanging of the battle-field; the third, Adagio Patetico, portraying the prayers and reminiscences of Joan when in prison; while the fourth, the Meto di Passione, explained by the line "Brief is the sorrow, endless is the joy," brings the work to a brilliant conclusion. Those who went prepared to enjoy a musical treat of an exceptionally high order were not disappointed. The composition from first to last was listened to with the utmost pleasure, and each movement was greeted with most hearty applause, the charming adagio melody especially calling forth expressions of the most unqualified delight. Our distinguished countryman was fortunate, moreover, in having so clever an exponent of his work as Miss Channell, the young lady throughout her arduous task showing an intelligent appreciation of the ideas of the composer, combined with executive skill of a very high order. At the conclusion of the sonata she was recalled to the platform to receive well-merited plaudits from the audience, and on a loud cry being raised for the composer, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett bowed his acknowledgments from one of the private boxes at the end of the room amidst a scene of great enthusiasm. In other respects the programme was very attractive, the bénéficiaire herself singing Bennett's "Forget me not," Donizetti's "La Dea del Lago," and Randegger's "Peacefully slumber," besides taking part with Mr. W. H. Cummings in a new duet by Alice Mary Smith, called "Love's summer-land." In each of these Madame Jewell acquitted herself to the entire satisfaction of her numerous patrons. Miss Edith Wynne was encored after a brilliant rendering of Bishop's "Tell me my heart," for which she substituted "The Bells of Aberdovey." Mr. W. H. Cummings and Miss Marion Severn both successfully carried out their share in the evening's entertainment, while the instrumental portion of the programme, in addition to the sonata already mentioned, was intrusted to Mr. Henry Holmes (violin), Mr. John Thomas (harp), and Mr. Walter Macfarren (pianoforte). The concert opened and concluded with some part songs, very prettily rendered by a select choir of lady students from the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. W. H. Thomas gave his second concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Monday week, assisted by Mdlle. José Sherrington, Mrs. Watts Hughes, Miss B. Randall, Mdme. Patey, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, S. Graham, Lewis Thomas, and J. G. Patey. The programme opened with Verdi's trio, "Te sol quest anima," which was well sung by Mdlle. Sherrington, S. Graham, and Lewis Thomas. Mrs. Hughes was heard to advantage in "Non più mesta" (Rossini) and the Welsh song, "Eos Lais." Mdlle. Sherrington was recalled for a good rendering of F. Cowen's song, "Spinning." She also sang the "Shadow air" from Dinorah, and received a merited encore, in response to which she substituted "Home, Sweet Home." Sullivan's "Looking Back" was splendidly sung by Mdme. Patey, and loudly re-demanded, but the favourite contralto preferred to sing "She wore a wreath of roses." Mr. Rigby contributed B. Richards' "Anita" (recalled) and Shield's "The Thorn" (encored). It is needless to say they were both capitally rendered. Mr. Lewis Thomas gave, with his usual excellence, Poniatowski's "Yeoman's wedding song" (encored), and Mendelssohn's "I'm a roamer" (recalled); while Mr. Patey was very successful in "The bell-ringer" (Wallace). Songs were also sung by Miss Randall and Mr. Graham. The bénéficiaire, who met with a warm reception, played Chopin's "Fantaisie impromptu," Liszt's arrangement of "La regatta Veneziani," and Weber's "Rondo brillante," with so much sound judgment and executive ability as to afford another proof that we have in him a pianist of no mean promise. In response to the encore which followed his playing of the last-named piece, a "Bourrée" by Bach was substituted with entire success. A large audience filled the room, and Mr. Thomas may be congratulated on the success of his concert. Mr. A. H. Thouless and Mr. F. Manby were efficient conductors.

Mr. Oberthür attracted a large number of admirers of the harp (of which instrument he is one of the most distinguished professors) to the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, on Tuesday morning, to listen to his fine performances. There was, besides, an interesting and varied programme of vocal and instrumental music, so that everyone's taste was gratified. The feature of the concert was Mr. Oberthür's trio in C major, for violin, violoncello, and harp (the second he has written for the same instruments), played by Herr Josef Ludwig, Herr Elsner, and the composer, and played in so perfect a way that the composer must have felt as pleased as the public acknowledged themselves to be by their hearty applause at the end of each movement. Mr. Oberthür afterwards exhibited his perfect command over his instrument by his brilliant performance of Parish Alvars' Fantaisie Caracteristique on themes from Oberon, at the conclusion of which he was unanimously recalled to the platform. In the second part, Mr. Oberthür gave his charming Musical Illustration, "Clouds and Sunshine," (one of the many little gems for the harp that Mr. Oberthür has written), and was again recalled to receive the approbation of his audience. The last piece played by Mr. Oberthür was his popular duet, for harp and piano, on Lucrezia Borgia, in which he had as co-adjutor the clever young pianist, Miss Flora Heilbron; who also, in the course of the concert, played in dashing style Weber's "Rondo brillante," for piano solo. Mr. Oberthür showed his ability as a composer of vocal music in a charming romance, "I would I were" ("Je voudrais être"), sung, in French, by Madame Elvira Behrens, accompanied on the harp by Mr. Oberthür, and in a fine song, "Die Entdeckung," sung, in German, by Mdlle. Natalie Carola, accompanied by the composer on the pianoforte. Among the other items of the programme deserving especial notice were a solo on the clarionet, beautifully played by Mr. Lazarus; a ballad and polonaise for the violin, by Vieuxtemps, capitally executed by Herr Josef Ludwig; a violoncello solo by Servais ("Le Desir"), perfectly rendered by Herr Elsner, who was deservedly recalled; Mr. Sullivan's romance, "Oh! ma charmante," sung with consummate taste by Mr. Wilbye Cooper; a canzone by M. Scuderi, sung so excellently by Signor Caravoglia that he was unanimously called upon to repeat it; Sir Michael Costa's "Dall' asilo della pace," perfectly vocalised by Mdlle. Carola; and the romance, "Quando le sere" (Luisa Miller), sung by Signor Urio, whose voice came out with astonishing power and sweetness. We have not space to mention all the other good things provided by Mr. Oberthür, but we must not pass over Mr. Ganz's popular song, "The nightingale," sung by Mdlle. Carola (recalled), and Signor Scuderi's "Dormi pur," effectively sung by Signor Caravoglia. The vocal music was accompanied on the pianoforte by Signor Visetti, Herr W. Ganz, and Herr Adolph Gollmick. Mr. Oberthür had the honour of receiving several musical "notabilities" at his matinée, among whom were Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, Dr. Hans von Bülow, and Sir Michael Costa.

Miss Helen Hogarth's concert took place on Wednesday week in the Hanover Square Rooms, and added to a long list of successes. Among the artists who assisted were Madame Sherrington, Miss Poyntz, Miss Gaetano, the Misses Holman-Andrews, Madame Alvsleben, Miss Philp, Signor Gardoni, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Tito Mattei, &c. It is, of course, unnecessary to dwell upon the details of a programme containing many well-known pieces, and it will suffice to make special mention of a few among the more notable things. The Misses Andrews were very successful in Benedict's duet, "The Crusaders," obtaining an encore which they richly deserved. Signor Gardoni, always a favourite in concert-rooms, was heard to great advantage in "Mio caro tesore," responding to an encore for which he substituted "La donna e mobile;" and Madame Alvsleben added to her fast-increasing reputation in this country by singing music so widely different as the "Shadow Song" in Dinorah and "Robin Adair." One of the greatest successes of the occasion was made by Mr. Alfred Howell, principal violoncello at the Royal Italian Opera, who played a solo with such exquisite production of tone and finish of style as to win the hearty applause of every listener. Mr. Howell is an artist who, in any country but England, would have far too many engagements as a soloist to allow of his wasting sweetness on the (comparatively) desert air of orchestral music. Altogether the concert was a great success and reflected credit upon the purveyorship of the bénéficiaire.

Signor and Madame Arditi gave a matinée musicale at their residence on Monday, which was attended by a host of "notabilities," who listened as attentively as "notabilities" ever do listen to a programme of music especially adapted to their tastes. Among the "interpreters" were Mdlle. José Sherrington, who gave fluently and successfully the variation in "Ah! vous dirai-je maman;" Madame Trebelli-Bettini, who sang, in her perfect style, "C'est l'Espagne;" and Mdlle. Marie Rozé, who did the same for Mr. Cowen's "Marguerite." Signors Naudin and Borella gave a duet from L'Elisir d'Amore, and the former the barcarole from Fra Diavolo. Signor Campobello represented the English element, and sang "Honour and arms" in a way that did him infinite credit. Miss Arditi was the instrumentalist. She played a polonaise by Chopin in so effective a way (the aristocratic audience, for a wonder, listening, instead of talking, as usual,) that she was recalled, whereupon the fair and youthful pianist treated her listeners to the "Husarenritt" of Herr Spindler. A feature of the programme was a duet by Nicolai, "One Word" ("Dis moi un mot"), sung, in French, by Madame Arditi and Colonel Mapleson, which delighted the audience beyond measure. Miss Macvitz, the young Russian contralto, also sang two songs, and the vocal pieces were accompanied on the pianoforte by Signors Visetti and Arditi.

The annual benefit of the director of the famous Henry Leslie's Choir took place on Thursday week in St. James's Hall. There was a good attendance, and, if nothing was done which presented a special attraction, the programme generally had the merit of containing a large number of popular works. The choir sang, among other things, Henry Leslie's prize madrigal, "Thine eyes so bright," and "Awake, awake!" Walter Macfarren's "Shepherds all and Maidens fair" (encored); Weelke's madrigal, "As Vesta was descending;" Wilbye's "Sweet honey-sucking bees;" "and Benet's "Flow, O, my tears." All these were executed with the perfect finish which has so honourably distinguished the choir, and were received with general enthusiasm. The vocal solos were confided to Mdlle. Valleria, Mdme. Trebelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Borella; Mdme. Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé being the instrumentalists. These artists are too well known to make needful a detailed record of their doings. Enough that each contributed familiar things to the programme, and won familiar successes. The most interesting feature of the evening was Beethoven's Sonata in F, for piano and violin, played to perfection by Mdme. Néruda and Mr. Hallé, both of whom were recalled by a delighted audience. Mr. Leslie had a hearty reception on making his appearance at the conductor's desk.

Mr. and Madame Alfred Gilbert began their series of musical reunions at St. George's Hall on Monday evening. They were assisted by Madame Poole, Signor Caravoglia, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Herr Straus, and Signor Pezze. Mr. Gilbert's solo piece was Beethoven's sonata in C (Op. 53), and his concerted pieces, Beethoven's trios, Op. 1, No. 3, and Op. 70, No. 2. Madame Gilbert sang the Sleep Song from Handel's Semele, and "Pur dicesti," by Lotti; Madame Poole, "Ah! rendemi quel core;" Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Sullivan's "O ma charmante" (encored); and Signor Caravoglia, two songs by Mozart. Mr. Charles E. Stephens accompanied the vocal pieces on the pianoforte.

PROVINCIAL.

Cambridge.—The Cambridge Express, May 24, contained the following:—

"The fifty-fourth concert of the Cambridge Amateur Musical Society was most successfully given on Wednesday last. The first part consisted of Mr. Henry Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, composed for the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1864, and now produced in Cambridge for the first time. The whole work is of the greatest merit, the instrumentation being very fine. The solos were rendered most efficiently by Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Christian. Miss Wynne fairly won the unanimous applause bestowed upon her in 'Our home shall be,' in the duet, with Mr. Lloyd, 'Hark, those spirit voices,' and 'Here may we dwell.' Mr. Lloyd was most successful in his songs, 'The full moon is beaming,' and 'What form do I see?' the applause accorded to him shewing the great appreciation of his singing. Mr. O. Christian appeared for the first time in Cambridge, and sang the part allotted to him with the greatest care, and came in for his share of applause in the fine song, 'The sea rules all.' The second part of the concert was miscellaneous, opening with the overture of Masaniello, very beautifully performed by the band, the wind parts being most effectively played by members of the First Life Guards' band, whose services were most valuable. Mr. Lloyd followed with 'Good-bye, sweetheart,' and fairly electrified the audience, as evinced in the unmistakable demand for an encore, which was acceded to. He then sang 'Come into the garden, Maud,' and again evoked boisterous applause. Miss Wynne delighted the company with 'She wandered down the mountain side.' Encores again being in the ascendant, she sang a new song, 'Mispah,' in the most pleasing manner. Mr. Christian, sustaining 'Homeward Bound,' succeeded in an encore, as did Mr. Davis, for his finely executed solos upon the harp. We cannot conclude this notice without saying a word of praise to the conductor, Mr. H. J. Brown."

Antwerp.—One of the most popular members of the dramatic company here is, for the moment, Cérise, a canine actor, who sustains the part of Azor in La Courte Paille, and is a worthy colleague of Killjoy, alias Rabat-joie, now delighting the frequenters of the Adelphi by his performance in the Wandering Jew.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller has arrived in London from Cologne. Everybody will welcome this most truly distinguished of living German musicians.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From the "Literary World.")

THE ART OF DRESS IN MONTALLUYAH.

The ladies after marriage are allowed to wear very rich costumes, of beautiful texture and most brilliant colour. They have colours more intense than ours. One, a bright silver-green, is radiant with all the vividness and brilliancy of our southern sunsets. This peculiar silver-green is obtained by exposing the silk, when woven into the piece, to the rays of the sun during the half-hour after noon. They have also a most beautiful silk, called "sun-silk," to produce which the sun is made to bear on silk-worms at particular hours of the day, and the result is, that the silk of the cocoon is of a colour resembling that of a bright sun.

"The costume of the lady is loose and flowing. A jacket or bodice of purple tissue covers the right arm and one side of the body to the waist, leaving the left arm, shoulder, and part of the bosom exposed. A small waistcoat made of crimson tissue is worn underneath the bodice. The tunic is made of white tissue, beautifully embroidered with gold thread. The short skirt shows trousers of golden tissue, full, and not unlike those of your Turks. They are confined at the ankle by anklets, made of plain gold for the middle classes, whilst those worn by the upper classes are of rarer metal, ornamented with precious stones. There are fringe trimmings to the tunic, made of precious metals of every variety of colour, selected for their lightness and beauty, and enriched at their extremities with precious stones. The feet are protected by a sole secured either by sandals or by means of an adhesive material. Women are not allowed to wear stays, or in any way to confine the waist. Indeed, such encumbrances would suit no good purpose, inasmuch as their forms are actually beautiful. Their spines, in consequence of their physical education, are strong, and every part of the person which might possibly require support, is in its proper place. . . . The marriage costume is generally purple and gold; the rich being magnificently attired, and wearing beautiful jewels in the hair."

THE LAWS OF MARRIAGE.

"The day of the civil marriage is one of unalloyed joy. In the selection of the day, even the elements are studied by men specially devoted to meteorology, who, with perfect infallibility, can predict the weather for a fortnight. Three months after the birth of each child the marriage ceremony is repeated, the same assembling of friends, the feasting, and the same purification and adornment of the bride taking place as when the parties were married. No religious ceremony, with the exception of a short prayer, takes place on the day of the civil marriage. The bride and bridegroom are supposed to be too much engrossed with the thoughts of their coming joys to give proper attention to prayers pronounced by others. The bride and bridegroom, however, are each expected to pray in private as their own hearts may prompt. The religious ceremony takes place at a convenient period, when a year has expired after the civil marriage, and we are justified in hoping that the newly-married pair, by their conduct to each other, have given evidence that they are worthy of the blessings now to be solemnly invoked. When the day arrives the bride is dressed in white, without a single jewel. Both she and the bridegroom prostrate themselves when receiving the blessing. As the ceremony is supposed to be exclusively religious, there is no feasting. If the couple have had any serious dissension during the year the religious ceremony is postponed; but great efforts are made to reconcile the difference, and if these are successful the solemnity takes place. When, on the other hand, a reconciliation cannot be effected, the law insists on a separation of the parties; who, however, may be reconciled at any time. As neither is allowed to marry again, polygamy is forbidden, and, as irregularities are out of the question, a reconciliation can almost always be effected, unless, indeed, there is some cause sufficiently grave to render a separation necessarily final. Such cases are exceptional in the extreme. . . . Husband and wife are now really considered and treated as one. At places of amusement, and in public conveyances, they pay for one only. In calculating the number of persons present, we say, for example, 'there are 200 doubles and 100 singles'—this with you would make 500. We count them as 300 only."

THE SCIENCE OF DISEASE-GERMS

Is sedulously cultivated; and physicians take very high rank in Montalluyah. Their revenue is great, and they are wholly provided for by the state. Their chief occupation is to preserve the patient's health and prevent disease, and should any one from any but accidental causes fall ill, they consider it as a disgrace to them! The laws of Tootmanyso provide for the protection of children from their birth, and minute precautions are taken in the care of infants; they are happily spared all pain in cutting their teeth, by the application of a certain bulb or root, which is so softening and relaxing in its effects, that after a short time the teeth make their way through the gums with perfect ease. Gymnastics and sea-bathing are insisted on as indispensable in the physical education of youth. The blood of all animals killed for food is analysed by the "field doctors," who, if it does not contain the proper ingredients, reject the flesh as unwholesome. Those appointed to the education of the young are called "character-divers," and their duty is to detect and eradicate in the child the germs of the imperfections and crimes of the man. They have in Montalluyah an electric telegraph, not unlike that used in our world, but different in construction and mode of working. What is written at one station is reproduced in its exact size and form at another. Even a portrait designed at one end of the telegraph, with the electric acid would be instantaneously reproduced at the other end—perhaps many hundred miles distant.

What may be the real purport of this very curious volume it is not easy to determine; a sort of Utopia is depicted, the customs and government of which deserve serious consideration, and afford some really valuable suggestions; but as the conditions of Montalluyah differ in many respects widely from our own, its laws and manners can scarcely be received as models by terrestrial states. The editor wisely refrains from explaining by what means such extraordinary experiences were acquired, since any attempt to unfold them at present would only increase the reader's incredulity. Whether the fragments were obtained by spiritual revelations we are not informed; but it seems impossible to account for them in any other way. He says—"When these revelations, or others derived from the same source, have succeeded in establishing a confidence between the editor and his readers, it is more than probable that the secret of the source itself will be disclosed. That disclosure made in due season will bring to light some unprecedented, but most interesting facts, and will establish the important truth that the soul of man is immaterial and immortal."

And, in the meantime, we can recommend Another World as decidedly clever and original. It treats of all sorts of practical subjects, and presents an immense variety of interesting topics all skilfully and gracefully treated; and it certainly calls attention to evils which, though remedied in the highly-favoured Montalluyah, still flourish in unchecked luxuriance on our own planet of this earth.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

Two concerts have taken place lately at the Etablissement. They were announced more than a fortnight previously, to be given "au profit de l'eune de Notre Dame des Arts." An institution founded in Paris in the year 1855, and one worthy of patronage and support; for "Our Lady of the Arts" takes under her protecting wing the daughters of men "recommandable par leurs travaux dans les professions liberales (savants, publicistes, litterateurs, artistes, &c.)," and has for her object the education (general and professional) of these young ladies. "Notre Dame des Arts" was founded by Madame Fernande de Jaubert-Vicomtesse d'Anglars (en Religion, Réverénde Mère Marie-Joseph), and was recognised by Imperial decree, May 6, 1861. "Notre Dame" is, of course, put to much expense with the education of her adopted daughters, and is not rich; she, therefore, appeals to "art patrons" to help her, and some of her adopted daughters aid her in her appeal.

One word more before I allude to the concerts in aid of the funds of this institution. "Les orphelines sans fortune ont toujours la priorité."

The artists who came to Boulogne last week were M. Horace Poussard (violin), M. Aurèle (Theatre des Variétés, Paris), M. G. Bachmann (pianist), Mdlle. Sereste (de l'Opéra Comique), and Mdlle. Féline Montal. The programme, which consisted of eleven pieces, was varied and well selected. Mdlle. Sereste, with a rich, well-trained, soprano voice, gave us a grand air from Traviata (in French, "Je préfere mes plaisir à toi amour"), and joined Mdlle. Montal in a duet from Le Maçon of Auber with good effect, finishing with Donizetti's air from the Fille du Regiment, "Salut à la France." M. Poussard's performance of a fantasia on Martha, arranged by himself for the violin, was most expressive, and showed his finesse in the handling of that beautiful instrument, as also did "Une plainte," also composed by himself. M. Bachmann showed great execution and taste in playing a "Marche Hongroise," and other pieces, on a grand piano, lent specially for the occasion by M. Henri Herz.

After the concert a most charming opéra-comique, entitled Mam'zelle Mariette, paroles de M. Aurèle, musique de M. Bourgeois, was put upon the boards, and played and sung by Mdlle. Montal and M. Aurèle. Of the young lady all that I can say is, that she sang accurately and well, and promises to become a good artist and do credit to her foster mother, for she owes her musical and general education to "Notre Dame des Arts." M. Aurèle, who appeared as the lover, and to prove the constancy of his fiancée, changed costume three different times (once as an old man), threw himself entirely into the different characters, and sang with good effect.

From the above, I do not doubt, you will expect me to finish by stating that the Etablissement was crammed with the music-loving art patrons of Boulogne. A fortnight ago I wrote of the "rush" there was to get a seat at an English circus, and I then remarked, "Chaqu' un á son gout"—well, I can only say, let that sentiment be echoed (if an echo can be done so late as a fortnight after the sound). The concert on Sunday—mostly attended by French—was not well attended, but on Monday evening there were only seventy-two people present!! Boulogne possesses five or more musical societies; the Boulognaise profess to be great patrons of art, but if they make themselves conspicuous by being absent on occasions when real "art" visits their town (especially "art" deserving patronage). Well! Que Dieu defende "Notre Dame des Arts."

We hope to have a visit from the same artists in August, when I trust we may have another result—at all events not the loss of a large sum of money to persons who work for a charitable object.

I have friends lately returned from Brussels who speak in the highest terms of the sparkling, clever music of M. Charles Lecocq in La Fille de Mdme. Angot. It must be a great success in London. I don't despair of our having it here during the season, i.e., if we can attract the artists to our seaside home.

The Testimonial to Sir William Hamilton, for 57 years British Consul at Boulogne-sur-Mer (referred to in these columns in March last), was presented to him at his residence in the Grand Rue, on Monday last, June 2nd; twenty-one gentlemen of the committee, together with the mayor (M. Huguet), the ex-mayor, and the Deputé du Pas de Calais (M. A. Adam), being present.

The Testimonial, which consisted of a dessert service and tea and coffee service, and which cost the sum of £600, was on view at the Etablissement des Bains, on Saturday and Sunday, which "establishment" the mayor graciously threw open to all who wished to see the same.

An appropriate inscription on the centre-piece of the dessert service recorded the fact that Sir William Hamilton had served his country in "naval and consular duties" for seventy years, from 1803 to 1873.

The Saison des Bains has commenced. Horses have been "laid on," or, rather, are ready to be attached to the bathing machines for persons who wish to take "headers" off their top steps into 18 inches deep water.

The daily concerts, under the direction and conductorship of M. Clement, commence on the 15th. The opera season will probably begin soon after.

MILAN.—Great regret is manifested at the death of the celebrated Alessandro Manzoni. At a special meeting of the Communal Council it was resolved that the house of the deceased should be purchased and used as a Record Office, the study of the author of the Promessi Sposi being preserved as he left it. A public subscription has been set on foot for the purpose of erecting a bronze monument in the Piazza Belgiojoso, the Corporation subscribing 20,000 francs. It is said that both the Via del Giardino and the Teatro della Commedia will change their names, and in future be called after the great author.—Auber's opera, Les Diamants de la Couronne, has proved a failure. This would not say much for the good taste of the Milanese were it not that the work is presented to them in such a shape as to be nearly irrecognisable. A certain Signor Gelli has replaced the spoken dialogue by recitatives of his own composition. These have nothing in common with Auber's sparkling music, and, moreover, are so fearfully long that some one has suggested that, instead of the management announcing in the bills: "Music by Auber with recitatives by E. Gelli," they should reverse the order of things and say: "Recitatives by E. Gelli with some pieces by Auber."—There is no foundation for the report, first published in a German paper, that Aida is to be produced next season at Berlin. At any rate, there is nothing definitely decided as yet, and, therefore, the part of the heroine cannot have already been forwarded by Herr von Hülsen, the Prussian Intendant-General, to Mdme. Mallinger.

A JEWISH MUSICAL COLLEGE.

The Rev. M. Hast, First Reader of the Great Synagogue, and the Rev. Dr. Weiss, First Reader of the Great Synagogue at Warsaw, joint publishers of the "complete collection of Sacred Jewish Music," have issued a circular in which they submit to the Jewish public the propriety of establishing a Jewish Musical College for the purpose of teaching music, both theoretically and practically, to the youth and adults of our community; also for the purpose of training choristers for synagogal purposes. They intend to devote their attention to the advancement of the institution (if established) by their united services; and in order to attain its speedy establishment, the rev. gentlemen have secured the co-operation of Mr. H. de Solla, as Musical Director of a series of choral and instrumental performances, in which several excellent vocalists and a choir, comprising a hundred voices, will take part. The programme will consist of sacred and classical Hebrew compositions, sung in the original text. The proceeds of these performances will be devoted to the purposes of establishing the institution.—The Jewish World.

ODE.

IN MEMORY OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT. SET TO MUSIC BY LUIGI ARDITI.

(To be performed at the Commemoration Festival of the Crystal Palace, 10th June, 1873.)

INVOCATION.

From your starry homes above,
In the distant azure skies,
Now Angelic hosts send forth
All your Heaven born harmonies.
Aid us in the humble prayers,
Join the joyous songs of praise,
With a nation's heart and voice
To our God on high we raise.

CHORUS OF ANGELS.

Hear them, O Lord! They seek to honour one
Who Thy command on earth hath ever done:
There faithfully he served and followed Thee,
Placing his trust alone in Thy decree.
In mercy, then, bow down Thine ear, O Lord,
And all Thy bounteous grace to them accord.

THE ANGEL OF PEACE.

Ling'ring in seeming fond delay,
The tender echoes pass away.

Oft I wander through the land
Where the thistle and the rose
With the shamrock grow entwined,
And their fairest tints disclose.

There aggression is unknown,
There no sound of war is heard,
And the heart of man is warmed
By fond woman's faithful word.

There my footsteps lead me on
Through bright em'rald fields and bowers,
Where the acorn and the sheaves
Lie embedded in sweet flowers.

Princely wisdom in that land
Hath left many a noble trace—
Deeds of goodness—deeds of love—
Ages never can efface.

THE ANGEL OF PLENTY.

I follow in the ways of peace,
When among nations discords cease;
My heralds are the sons of earth,
Who live their life to give it worth.
Most surely can they prophesy
My coming by their industry.
On prince and peasant I attend,
The honest work of each befriend;
Ne'er failing one true heart or hand
That does its duty in the land.

TWO ANGELS.

We are present in prosperity.
We are faithful in adversity.

O'er the dwellings upon earth
Where good-will and love abound,
Constant watch and ward we keep,
In the tranquil air around.

Ever silent and unseen,
We our Master's will obey,
And protect the true and just
In their dwellings night and day.

All the melodies and thoughts,
Grown familiar in a home,
Are confided to our care,
To restore in time to come.

They can soothe the widow'd heart
When the first sad days go by,
Calming sorrow's bitter pang
By the spell of memory.

CHORUS OF MORTALS.

Here where the Arts have made a home,
In humble gratitude we come,
To do all honour to a name
Undying as our country's fame;
A name not made by battles won,
By reckless deeds of daring done,
But by a guiding power of mind
Bent to the service of mankind.
Ere life had fall'n into decay
The benefactor passed away:
Passing away, through gloom and tears,
Into the everlasting spheres,
Where all the steps in life he trod
Lead through their purity to God.

PRAYER OF MORTALS.

Let us Kneel Down and Pray.

God of might, majesty, and power,
Who in affliction's darkest hour
Didst give us grace to trust in Thee,
And Thy great mercy stedfastly;
Vouchsafe now, through Thy only Son,
To sanctify our thoughts of one
Whose mem'ry haunts this earthly Fane,
Even as some ethereal strain.

We know Thy Word gives to the bless'd
True promise of eternal rest,
And we believe He lives again,

(THE ANGELS.
He lives again.)

Free from all mortal care and pain,
In Heaven!
With Thee, O God, to whom we pray
For strength of heart to keep Thy way:
Guide us, O Lord, that we may be,
In all eternity, with Thee.

Arise! Arise!
And let thanksgivings echo through the skies.
Praise ye the Lord! all nations here below;
Praise ye the Lord! from whom all blessings flow.

Protect, O God, all those who worship Thee;
Guard those who have Thy faithful servants been;
Guard and bless her, whom Thou hast called to be Thy chosen minister on earth—our Queen.

ALLELUIA.

Laudate Dominum de cœlis
Laudate eum in excelsis.

AN event peculiarly interesting to the musical public during the present month will be the revival of Handel's Oratorio Theodora, on Tuesday next, the 10th inst., at the Hanover Square Rooms. Thanks are already due to Mr. Barnby for reviving Jephtha and Belshazzar, and it is to be under his direction that Theodora will be heard for the first time in England since its composer's death. The work will be performed with complete orchestra and a chorus composed of the voluntary choir of St. Anne's Church, Soho, augmented to about 100 voices; and the solo parts will be intrusted to ladies and gentlemen amateurs. The proceeds of the concert are to be devoted to the restoration of St. Anne's Church.—Musical Times.

WAGNER AND THE HOTTENTOTS.*

A deputation of but slightly civilised savages, who have arrived in Vienna from the depths of Hottentotia, trembled with joy on hearing the sounds of an overture, composed expressly for the Exhibition by Herr R. Wagner, and comprising in itself everything that musical tinkering has ever produced up to the present time. Magnificent testimony of a barbaric nation! Ah! thou absolute master of tunes to come, Prophet of the long-tailed notes of the Future, behold a people which stretches out its arms to thee! which opens to thee its heart! Lose not a minute; establish among these Blacks an institution in which thy music alone shall be played! The wild men are strong, and their lungs lasting! They will perform upon saxhorns and trombones with a degree of energy of which we civilised people are incapable! Hold regal sway among their wild hordes! The ramparts of Jericho fell down when Gideon executed an air and variations upon his cornet-a-piston. Orpheus needed merely to play a fantasia upon the violin for lions and elephants to lick his hands. Why should'st not thou, great prophet, succeed in civilising these tribes? What a leaf would there not grow for thee in history, if thou did'st so! Music softens our manners and tames our passions, as thou knowest, for thou thyself causest us to feel this very unmistakably.

These Hottentots were deeply moved; they understood thy genius. Hie thee, then, to them in their own country, in the dark regions of their deserts! Do not deny them this boon! Thou wilt be for them as the sun, as the light; they will bless thee! The name of Wagner, the immortal Wagner, will still echo on their lips when thousands of years have rolled past since thy heavenly soul left its earthly case.

Besides, these wild creatures will always cherish you as superior to everyone else, as the god of music; for, out among themselves, they will not have to institute comparisons. Since they will be acquainted with nothing more than thy artillery, they will not be in a condition to say that somewhere or other there lives a queen called Melody. Haste thee, Wagner, and at the next Exhibition thou wilt return as chief of a black host, in the costume of a wild man, with feathers on thy head, rings in thy ears, and a bamboo of honour in thy hand. Thus wilt thou lead on thy artist-apes, and prove to astonished Europe that nothing can resist the accents of thy sweet chords!

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL ORGAN.

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

Sir,—Will you allow me, one of the oldest members of St. Paul's Cathedral, to make an observation or two on the letter which appears in your columns this morning headed "Completion of St. Paul's," and signed as containing the sentiments of five very important members of the committee under whose auspices the completion is to be carried out?

They complain of an additional architect being appointed who has already declared Sir Christopher Wren's works "abominations." I regret to think and to say that, as far as the works at St. Paul's have been hitherto carried on by the committee at large, the features of the church, as Sir Christopher left them, have been considered and treated as "abominations."

Sir Christopher Wren left the floor of the church on one dead level, and the organ parting the choir from the nave. The committee, after trying their hand at putting the organ into one of the ladies' closets, so called, and buying and setting up at enormous cost another great organ in the south transept, have now come to the conclusion that both are mistakes, and they have determined that the great organ shall be taken down and sold, if they can get a purchaser, and that the old organ—the Father Smith—shall be brought again from the ladies' closet, parted into two, and put up on each side of the entrance into the choir. This is being done; but in so doing they have destroyed the vista. The projecting organ on each side cuts off the view of the receding arches, which, as Sir Christopher left the church, might be seen from the west door, and thus one feature of exquisite beauty is destroyed; and, further, the building is made to appear shorter than it really is.

But then, further, I have already said that, as Sir Christopher left the church, the floor was on one level.

When the committee sank the old organ in the ladies' closet, they also at considerable expense lowered the stall-work of the choir eighteen inches; but when they discovered that the organ as so placed was really an "abomination" they determined to move it back again, if not exactly, as near as possible, to its old place. They discovered also that they had made a mistake by lowering the stall-work, inasmuch as it altered its properly adjusted height from the floor, as Sir Christopher left it. They determined, therefore, to raise it again to the height it was before. I rejoiced at this restoration.

But another unforeseen difficulty arose. The organ was to be blown by hydraulic apparatus from the crypt. The organ parted in two, as I have represented, the organist could only sit on one side, and that part of the organ on the side opposite to him was to be played by what are called trackers. It was presumed at first that these trackers would be placed under the floor in the crypt, where the hydraulic apparatus is; but this was found to be impossible on account of the Duke of Wellington's tomb being just at that spot. So that the floor of the choir was to be raised eighteen inches so as to admit of the trackers being placed beneath, and thus the one continuous level of the floor of the church is broken, and the just elevation of the stalls from the floor of the choir destroyed, and both altered from what Sir Christopher left them.

I could mention other features of the church which the committee have treated as "abominations," but I have said enough. The committee ought to have begun where Sir Christopher Wren left off. Before they can do so they must restore the floor of the choir to its original level, bring back the organ to its old place, and screen off the choir from the nave. In short, they must take the church as Sir Christopher left it. Their business is not to undo what he has done, but to carry out his plans. In other words, their business is to complete, not destroy.

LUCCA IN CHICAGO.

The Inter-Ocean, an influential journal of Chicago, thus noticed Mdme. Lucca's performance as Marguerite during her second visit to that resurrectionised city:—

"The brilliant week of Italian opera, which was closed yesterday afternoon with a second superb rendition of Faust to a house as large even as that of Wednesday night, will long be remembered by the thousands who have inspired the distinguished German cantatrice to renewed exhibitions of her genius, marking the most important epoch of operatic music in Chicago, as well as the most successful, financially. The audiences have been cosmopolitan and democratic, the apparently extravagant price not producing a caste in the patronage. The Lucca nights have drawn out the wealth and musical culture, the brains and the taste of our people more universally than any form of entertainment ever given before in the city. Those who remember Nilsson's electric tone foolishly offend themselves by comparing Lucca's therewith, forgetting that the voices are not to be compared; trying, in fact, to make themselves believe that the staccato of a delightful violin, which is Nilsson's voice, is better than the superb legato organ tone, which is Lucca's. Nilsson carried the listener away à l'outrance, and, perhaps, diminished a little in radiance before an evening was over. It is Lucca's advantage constantly to grow upon the senses, the imagination, and the mind of an audience, and to have reached the climax of a crescendo just as the curtain finally falls. Her voice is singularly devotional. Her vocal prayers have a pure majesty about them which one finds it difficult to define. Her versatility, already amply shown as Leonora, Marguerite, and Zerlina, will be further illustrated by the enactment of Mignon to-morrow evening. Goethe has defined genius to be but 'another name for industry,' and if Lucca makes as fine a Mignon as her Marguerite and Leonora, it may be as well admitted that industry is something infinitely better than inspiration."

WAIFS.

Miss Enriquez, the contralto, is engaged for the forthcoming Hereford and Bristol Festivals.

M. Vivier, the celebrated cornist, and still more celebrated humourist, has arrived in London.

Mr. Edward Murray has undertaken the management of "The Hall-by-the-Sea," Margate, which will be opened next month.

Miss Enriquez, whose singing was praised by our Birmingham correspondent in our impression of May 24th, should have been named as a pupil of Mr. Deacon, with whom she has been studying the last four years.

A ballad concert was given at St. James's Hall on Whit-Monday, under the auspices of Mr. John Boosey, with the aid of Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Santley, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, &c., &c.

A young couple in Ohio, being serenaded, felt that they did not wish to be thus honoured, whereupon the bride poured sulphuric acid upon the party, blinding one totally, destroying the eye of another, while she burned the faces of many others. The case is in court.

Mark Twain, in a letter to the (American) Graphic, thus announces the coming of a new literary sensation: "During the last two months my next-door neighbour, Charles Dudley Warner, has dropped his "Back-Log Studies," and he and I have written a bulky novel in partnership. He has worked up the fiction, and I have hurled in the facts. I consider it one of the most astonishing novels that ever was written. Night after night I sit up reading it over and over again and crying. It will be published early in the fall, with plenty of pictures."

"Signor Tamberlik," says Watson, "arrived in this city two or three days ago, from Havana, where his opera season did not prove a great success. The company was very large, the idea being that quantity would make up for quality; but it did not. Quantity in this case signally failed, for although there were five tenors in the company, an opera, announced for one night, could not be given, because those tenors who were up in it were indisposed, and those who were well did not know it. Tamberlik does not propose to sing here, but will 'do' the American Metropolis before he leaves for Europe."

La Fille de Madame Angot is still "running" at the St. James's Theatre. An alteration in the "cast" took place on Wednesday evening, when Mdlle. Desclauzas, the "creator" of the part of Mdlle. Lange, and who has played it 100 nights in Brussels, and 100 nights in Paris, made her début in London. Mdlle. Desclauzas made quite a furore. She is an inimitable comedienne, possesses an excellent voice, and knows how to use it to advantage. She was rewarded with immense applause, and had to repeat the famous duet with Mdlle. Pauline Luigini, "Ah! c'est donc toi Madame Barras ("Mais voyez donc c't ingénuité") no less than three times.

A small actor in a Parisian Theatre lately achieved success by very simple means. In a piece entitled Aristophanes, now playing at the Chateau d'Eau, a little boy, almost a baby, appears on the stage. This performer has his admirers, one of whom expressed approval by throwing not a bouquet, but a packet of bonbons, at his feet. Oblivious of responsive bows or stage directions, the child sat down by the footlights and began to devour these delicacies, while the curtain falling left him alone with the audience, who appreciated the incident. He was called into a box, and passed all round the house, receiving compliments and caresses; and more sugar-plums than were good for him.

An American poet suggests the following as a good beginning for a modern sentimental ballad, in the school of "Kiss him for his mother":—

"Willie had a purple monkey climbing on a yellow stick,
And when he sucked the paint all off, it made him deadly sick,
And in his last hour he clasped that monkey in his hand,
And bade good-bye to earth and went into a better land.
Oh, no more he'll shoot his sister with his little wooden gun,
And no more he'll twist the pussy's tail and make her yowl for fun,
The pussy's tail now stands out straight, the gun is laid aside,
The monkey doesn't jump around, since little Willie died."

An American critic says, no doubt honestly, about the choral portion of Beethoven's ninth symphony:—

"The choral movement is a fearful thing—fearful to execute, and still more fearful to listen to. Although it was executed with extraordinary precision and with enthusiastic vim, it proved but a chaos of sound, which might be denominated discordant noise, which excited a shuddering wonder, compounded more of disgust than pleasure. As an expression of joy, it is as appropriate as it would be to scream like a tiger-cat, when making a tender avowal to a gentle maiden. Our very bowels yearned with compassion, as the quartet screamed and the chorus screamed, and screamed still louder, until it became a yell, when fortunately it came to an end, and a momentary blessed silence ensued."

Moore apologised in a note for writing a song to the air of Savourneen Dheelish, as Campbell had previously adapted, or was supposed to have written, a beautiful ballad to the same exquisite melody. Since Moore's day a controversy has arisen whether the author of the "Pleasures of Hope" really wrote the patriotic song entitled "The Exile of Erin." In Ireland it has been established that George Nugent Reynolds, an Irish exile, who had to leave his country for political reasons, at the beginning of the present century, was the author. This opinion is strongly sustained by the fact that Mr. Reynolds composed a very pathetic ballad, entitled "Mary le More," with reference to the sufferings of a poor Irish girl during the troubles of the period. Reynolds, while sojourning at Altona, met and formed an acquaintance with the bard of "Hope," who at that time was under an engagement with the late Mr. Perry, the well-known proprietor of a London paper, to write an occasional piece of poetry for his journal. Reynolds, who was depressed in spirit, and cared not for fame, but only felt anxious to have his grievances made known, it is said, wrote the song entitled "The Exile of Erin," and presented it to Mr. Campbell for publication.—White's Echoes of Many Lands.

A portrait of Mozart is now on view at Messrs. Schott & Co.'s, 139, Regent Street, by an artist of the name of Goetz. It is said to be taken from life. Mozart is sitting with his fingers on the keys of a harpsichord. The likeness and expression are wonderful. Mr. Wolff (Schott & Co.) gave 200 guineas for the picture.

There are conjurors and conjurors. Some who bear the name possess themselves of an extensive apparatus, which requires a considerable outlay of money, but the possession of which enables its owner to perform seeming miracles, with little or no proficiency in the art which goes by the name of "legerdemain" or "sleight of hand." Some have scarcely any apparatus at all, but delude the eyes of their patrons by a rapid movement of the fingers, the result of a practice as arduous as that which is required for the attainment of brilliant execution on a musical instrument. To the latter and better class belongs Dr. Lynn, who comes hither armed with a recommendatory letter from M. Victor Hugo, and who is now performing at the Egyptian Hall. To suit the taste of the age, he affects now and then to hold a communication with spirits, but it is easy to perceive that here he is not in earnest, and that his grand ambition is to shine forth as a master of legerdemain. With him there is no dropping of half-crowns, &c., into sumptuous cases which, for all we know to the contrary, may contain a dozen false bottoms, but unmistakable glass tumblers, large boxes that anybody may search, flowerpots filled with earth, that anybody may gauge with a knife, borrowed hats and handkerchiefs, suffice for the performance of his singular experiments. With the aid of these, anything may be found anywhere but in the place where it was last deposited, some things make their unexpected appearance that have not been deposited in any place whatever, and words written on small pieces of paper by the spectators are not only deciphered without being seen, but the peculiarities of the handwriting are criticised. No one can say, of course, that Dr. Lynn scorns the use of confederates, but it is certain that he cheerfully accepts as an "assistant" any one who will step forward from the arena before him, and that persons whom he has never seen before are the particular subjects of his delusions. In the sham "black art" there have been few professors who can equal Dr. Lynn.

Mozart's last, and in some respects greatest, Symphony—the one in C, with the fugal last movement—was completed on the 10th August, 1788, the two preceding ones—the G minor and the E flat—being dated respectively July 25th and July 26th of the same year. Thus these three colossal masterpieces, besides sonatas, marches, canzonets, and other trifles, were produced in something like seven weeks. It was indeed a volcanic eruption of genius and labour, and one quite without parallel. There is no other instance in the history of art or literature of an effort at once so sudden, so sustained, and so enduring; of a man having conceived, or—even if we suppose the leading ideas to have been conceived before—having planned in perfect form and proportion, and elaborated to the minutest detail, the three greatest works of his life in a space of time barely sufficient for the manual labour of putting them into their permanent outward shape. It is not difficult to imagine the stress on that fertile brain and those nimble fingers, during the eight weeks of that Vienna summer in 1788—at a time, too, when Mozart was at the height of his social popularity, and when a quiet hour must have been a rare event. With these three noble works Mozart fitly closed his labours in the highest department of orchestral music, for there is no trace of his having designed or attempted another Symphony during the four years that elapsed before his death in 1791. The name Jupiter, though probably originating in mere caprice, like the soubriquets attached to some of Beethoven's compositions—"Moonlight Sonata," "Sonata Pastorale," "Sonata Appassionata," and the rest, nay, perhaps, the "Eroica" Symphony itself—has nevertheless a certain propriety, and expresses well enough the sustained grandeur and majesty which pervades the whole work, and which placed it at the head of the world of orchestral music, till it was dethroned 17 years later, in 1805, by the prodigious "Eroica" of Beethoven, a giant which seemed destined to tower over everything else for many a year to come. The distinguishing feature of the "Jupiter" Symphony is the concluding movement, a fugue on four subjects, written throughout in the strictest fetters of counterpoint, but with all the air and freedom of absolute license. "G."

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

(From "Macmillan's Magazine.")

We have endeavoured to describe one grand achievement of the best of Tootmanyosos in advancing the material prosperity of his kingdom. Let us now turn to his educational improvements, premising that nearly all his operations are based on that old-fashioned maxim, "prevention is better than cure." To extirpate phthisis and insanity, he set his doctors to investigate the primary forms of malady, and in general he was so successful that their work left off at a point preceding that at which the labours of the terrestrial practitioners begin. His system of education commences with the babies. Nothing is too great or too small for his comprehensive glance. He can look up to the summit of the mountain-supporter, all but lost in the clouds, and down to the lowest possible cradle in which an infant is to be nursed. He prevents a city above from tumbling down and smashing a city below, and he is equally gracious in preventing parents from boxing their children's ears, and from making them walk too early after the fashion of their elders. A series of machines were invented, under his auspices, by a man named Drahna, which, by the most gradual process, initiated infants into the independent use of their legs. The first machine is a soft spring-cushion, upon which the child is laid, and which is set in motion by the turn of a small handle. So delightful is the movement, that children have been heard to cry when the machine is stopped. Another machine, larger and stronger than the first, but similar in principle, is used before the first lesson in actual walking begins. In the third machine, which cannot be overturned, and in which every part of the body is supported, the legs of the child are alternately moved, so that it acquires a perfect notion of the sort of operation which it will have to perform in after-life, without the slightest strain on the limbs. In the fourth machine the child uses its own free will in the movement of its legs, but is upheld by a framework covered with bandages of down, which prevents the injuries that might otherwise arise from an ugly fall.

When the children arrive at an age fitted for school, they are under the care of "character-divers," who are totally distinct from the preceptors in the various branches of knowledge. Their duty is not to teach, but to discover the particular qualities, tendencies, and incipient faults of children, and to act accordingly, developing the germs of good, and eradicating those of evil. They are, to no small extent, assisted in their researches by the establishment of "Amusement Galleries," about which the children are allowed to stray between the hours of study, according to their own inclinations. The toys are mostly of an instructive kind, comprising small musical instruments, maps in relief, and even minute living animals; for Montalluyah is happy enough to possess horses and deer, in shape exactly resembling ours, but no larger than our ordinary lap-dogs. Under these favourable circumstances all sorts of characters are revealed. Vanity, or self-exaltation accompanied by envy, which exults in the depreciation of others, is an ill weed that frequently courts the scrutinising gaze of the character-divers, who tread it out with the gentlest of footsteps.

On the whole, the "amusement gallery" is less intended for male than for female children. Young girls frequent it until they leave school, but young men are forced to quit it when the irrepressible character-divers find their attendance no longer desirable. The Tootmanyoso did not intend to bring up a race of Geoffrey Delamaynes, but he would have had no violent objection to "Muscular Christianity." He instituted gymnastic exercises of a very terrestrial kind, and his sea-bathing for boys comprised headers from very lofty rocks. But, probably taking counsel of some Wilkie Collins of the planet, he showed excessive anxiety that the athlete should not degenerate into the bully. If a timid boy is required to leap into the sea from a very tall rock, six or seven of the bravest are selected to accompany him. They are forbidden to urge him to jump from the high elevation, or to taunt him for shrinking from the performance of the feat; and if he does not follow the example of bolder jumpers, the overseer of the party mildly remarks to him, "As you have not bathed from the rock, you had better bathe below." Ambition now does its work. The timid boy, advised to join the leapers from the lower part, who are his juniors, becomes anxious to imitate the braver boys of his own age. The proper jump is achieved at last, but such is the dread of self-exaltation that the utmost care is taken neither to praise the new-made athlete too much, nor to reproach him with awkwardness. No boy is allowed, under any circumstances, to taunt another with any weakness or failing, and, consequently, he who has overcome his timidity scarcely knows that it was fear which prevented him in the first instance from rising to a level with his companions.

Although an Oriental tone pervades the life of Montalluyah, there is no toleration of polygamy. Nay, a slight approach is made to the matrimonial regulations of the Moravians, inasmuch as a contract of marriage is not regarded as a merely private affair, but a matter in which the whole community is interested. In many districts a council of ladies, who have passed through certain ordeals, and a council of elders regulate everything relating to wedlock, and over each of them presides a man of a certain age and spotless character, whose mode of life has been watched and recorded from early years. Let not the advocates for "Woman's Rights" be too sure that they will find allies when there is direct communication between the earth and Mars. It will be observed that even the council composed of elderly ladies is not allowed to act without a male president.

As we have said, the approach to Moravian institutions is slight. If the young lady, whose marriage is intended, is not allowed to cast her eyes over the entire kingdom, she has a liberal allowance of eighty-five candidates, among whom she may make her choice, it being understood that the qualifications of these gentlemen have been first ascertained by the councils. Nor is the lady herself without the possibility of a voice in the formation of this general assembly; for, if she has a special liking for one particular person, she is allowed to communicate the fact privately to one of the ladies of the council.

During thirty-one evenings in succession the eighty-five candidates are assembled together in the presence of the young lady who, on these solemn occasions, wears a peculiar head-dress with a star in front. This is a distinctive mark. Other ladies are allowed to be present, but are not expected to pay court to the gentlemen: and the self-denying faculty of the "girls of the period" in Montalluyah is not weakly demonstrated by the fact that, in spite of the general suppression of flirtation, the privilege of attending these gatherings as a looker-on, if for one evening only, is eagerly sought. That in her embarras de richesses the lady with the star may not solve the difficulty by suddenly jumping to a choice, she is not allowed to announce her decision till the thirty-first evening has arrived. If the attractions of all the suitors are, at the first glance, tolerably equal, she examines their several pretensions, at the rate of about two suitors and three-quarters per evening; but, probably, some are mentally struck out of the list at the beginning, so that the deliberations of the damsel are confined to a comparatively small number.

On the awful thirty-first evening the maiden declares her decision by presenting the chosen one with an appropriate flower. Thereupon a band of music strikes up a well-known march, to the strains of which the happy man leads his intended to a throne, placed on a slightly raised dais. Each of the suitors then lays down a flower before the enthroned beauty, and this she will sometimes kiss when anxious to show that the donor, though rejected, did not occupy the lowest place in her esteem on the list of candidates.

If the thirty-first evening passes over without the expected event taking place, another assembly is called after the lapse of a year; but now the number of suitors is limited to forty-five, and the number of evenings to twelve, rapidity of decision being facilitated by the abbreviation of the time in which the choice is to be declared, and a diminution of the area over which the power of choice extends. In the case of another failure, another year elapses, and the assembly is now reduced to twenty-one, and the number of evenings to seven. If no result is obtained, the fastidious young lady is doomed to a life of single blessedness. This regulation has, however, but small practical value, since, in the recollection of the Tootmanyoso, who remembered everything, there had not been one case where the selection has been postponed beyond the second year.

We have stated above that the young lady whose hand is sought declares her preference by the presentation to the chosen one of an appropriate flower. To render intelligible the force of this statement it is necessary to explain that the inhabitants of Montalluyah, like the terrestrials of the East, have an elaborate language of flowers, of which Hermes gives us some pretty specimens. The meaning associated with each flower is universally understood, its name at once conveying its signification as distinctly as a combination of words. To so great an extent is proficiency in this language carried, that even long conversations are sometimes held between a lady and gentleman with flowers as the only medium of communication.

These gifted people also have a language of music, and in Montalluyah "Songs without words" would denote no exceptional form of composition, not only words but sentences being often implied by notes. Thus Lenardi, a noted harpist, taking his place at the instrument, expressed to a lady his admiration of her beauty and goodness, his hope that no other occupied her thoughts, the despair that he would feel if his suit were rejected. He wound up with the assertion: "Thou art pure as the dew upon the leaf of opening day; but like to that dew will thy love pass away"—and all this without the utterance from his lips of so much as an articulate sound. The lady, who was quite his match, took her turn at the harp, and, by a process similar to his own, told him so plainly that he need not despair, that a "choice-meeting" was convened, which resulted in a speedy marriage.

The harp is the national instrument of Montalluyah, and addresses several senses at once. Around its framework are devised small birds of variegated plumage, perched on foliage of green enamel, with flowers in their natural colours. The instant the player strikes the chords the birds open their wings, the flowers quiver, and from certain small vases concealed in the framework are thrown forth jets of perfume, the potency of which is regulated by the force of the harpist.

In these graceful sports of fancy, if so we may call them, there is nothing like intentional satire. "Hermes" appears in the character of an editor only, and the ostensible narrator of the wonders of Montalluyah is the reforming Tootmanyoso himself, the means of communication between author and editor being enveloped in mystery. But, altogether somebody, whether it be "Hermes" or the Martial potentate, presents the public with a large bouquet of very fragrant flowers, each of which has the peculiarity proper to the flowers of Montalluyah, that it is pregnant with suggestion.

We will conclude our notice of this most original and engaging book, from the varied storehouse of which we have made selections almost at random, with the good Tootmanyoso's profession of his practical philosophy:—

"I loved the world. The wicked only are impatient and discontented. I knew that blessings are everywhere about us, though we are expected to exercise our intelligence to make them available; and whilst I inculcated that 'intemperance is not enjoyment,' and that 'intemperance destroyed the power of enjoyment,' I did not hesitate to tell my people that the world and the blessings everywhere abounding are given us to enjoy, and that, like guests invited to a banquet, we were neither to run riot nor to reject the good things offered us in love."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Although there have been no "novelties" of late at the theatre, Mr. Gye has been enabled to provide an attractive series of performances. As we are now in the zenith of the season, when all the world, pretty well under any circumstances, is, more or less, sure to go to the Opera, Mr. Gye, with his repertory of popular works immediately at command, is, no doubt, justified in adhering to that repertory, and the more so as it affords the best singers in his company opportunities of shining which might not be found in new or unfamiliar works. How Mdme. Adelina Patti executes the music and impersonates the character of Meyerbeer's Dinorah need no more be told than how she executes the music and acts the part of Leonora in Verdi's well-worn Trovatore. She has played both, and with the accustomed success—the greater degree of curiosity attaching to Leonora, because it is one of those parts in which she has figured much more rarely, Valentine, in the Huguenots, excepted, than in any other of her varied catalogue. As we have said on previous occasions, a more ideal performance of a character almost worn to tatters could hardly be imagined. Mdme. Patti breathes a new life into it. More about Il Trovatore, except it be that Signor Graziani came back again to us, as the Conte di Luna, and received his customary encore for the melodious air, "Il balen del suo sorriso," that Mdlle. Scalchi was the Azucena, and Signor Nicolini the Manrico, it is unnecessary to say.

More interesting still was Madame Patti's re-appearance as Desdemona, in Otello, an opera which, however unequal, contains some of the most beautiful music ever composed by Rossini—which is equivalent to saying some of the most beautiful music written by any composer whatever. In this delineation Madame Patti, at the actual moment, may justly be pronounced unrivalled. Desdemona is the personage in the opera whom the Italian librettist, either by accident or design, has allowed us to compare most fitly with the creation of our great poet. We all know what that is; and to say that Madame Patti presents us with an ideal embodiment is to award her the highest praise. And this, as we have more than once stated, is the simple fact. Madame Patti depicts all the feminine gentleness, and, at the same time, all the passionate fervour of Desdemona. The broad outline is there; and, as artistic adjuncts, we have the most carefully worked out details. We need not again enter into a minute description of this very remarkable assumption, of which the culminating point is the last act, including the exquisitely pathetic romance, "Assisa a piè d'un salice?" (the "Willow Song"), sung by Desdemona to her confidential companion, Emilia, one of those melodies which seem to have no end; the lovely and impressive prayer, "Deh calma, o ciel, in sonno;" and the catastrophe, Desdemona's death at the hands of Otello. All this—as, indeed, all that went before—was done in perfection by Madame Patti, and appreciated by the audience according to its genuine worth. The part of Otello was represented by Signor Mongini, now, perhaps, the only tenor on the stage who has the means to give due effect to its most striking features. Such a voice as this Italian artist possesses is the gift of very few; and as, throughout the opera, Rossini has written for a "tenore robusto" of exceptional endowments, in Signor Mongini he has precisely the man to carry out his idea. We have on more than one occasion spoken of this gentleman's Otello, and merely repeat that, taken for all in all, it is his very best impersonation. Not to go into superfluous details, the grand duet between Otello and Iago (Signor Graziani), declaimed by both artists with extraordinary fire and animation, created the usual sensation. After being called back twice, with great enthusiasm, Signors Mongini and Graziani were compelled to sing the last movement again. The parts of Emilia, Elmiro, and Roderigo, were respectively confided to Mdlle. Corsi, Signors Capponi and Bettini. The general performance, conducted by Signor Vianesi, was good. Rossini's Otello, we may add, is an opera too rarely brought forward.

Another representation not to be passed over is that of the Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas, not alone on account of its own frequently acknowledged merits, but on account of the performance generally (conducted by Signor Bevignani). We have seen the Ophelia of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson and the Ophelia of Mdlle. Sessi, at Covent Garden. Now we have the Ophelia of Mdlle. Emma Albani, the gifted young Canadian, who already in several operas has won the unrestricted approval of amateurs. We wish to make no comparisons, but we can say emphatically that a more engaging and charming Ophelia could not well be imagined. That Mdlle. Albani has not entirely made herself mistress of some of the most trying passages of the music is true; but that she will eventually do so there can be no reason to doubt. She possesses all the indispensable requisities. Of course, Mdlle. Albani's great scene was the last—the madness of the unhappy Ophelia, leading to the catastrophe of her death. In other parts of the opera (we need not go into particulars) she left little to desire; but here she was very nearly perfect. Nothing more charming or unaffectedly expressive could be wished than her rendering of the plaintive Swedish air (Italice, "Bella e bionda"), given first as a solo and then in harmony by the chorus behind the scenes as the drowning Ophelia is seen floating along the stream. This, however, is Mdlle. Albani's first attempt at a task not merely difficult in itself but made still more difficult for any new aspirant by the remarkable performance of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, who "created" it in Paris, and was the first to make it known to a London audience. On account of this alone Mdlle. Albani may fairly be congratulated upon her undeniable success. About the Hamlet of M. Faure we have spoken more than once, and further acquaintance with it only increases the conviction that it is a master-piece of acting and singing. M. Faure, Frenchman though he be, has seized the characteristics of our Hamlet as though he were an Englishman, and had been bred and nurtured in the poetry of Shakespere. What kind of Hamlet was manufactured by the French librettists need hardly be told, but this accomplished artist would seem to have studied the drama from the foundation source. If he would only omit the drinking song at the end of Act III., notwithstanding the "encore" it invariably receives, we should be inclined to look upon him, in the present state of things, as a model Prince. The idea of Hamlet singing a "Bacchanalian" to the actors, and repeating a snatch of it before the King, Queen, and courtiers, after the play which has produced upon them so unspeakable an effect, could have only entered into the head of a Frenchman. It is unworthy of M. Faure, and it is unworthy of M. Ambroise Thomas, who has set the Gallic version of Hamlet to such thoughtful and suggestive music.

The other parts were sustained by Signors Bagagiolo (Claudius), Capponi (the Ghost), Bettini (Laertes), and Tagliafico (Horatio) —Madame Sinico representing the Queen, as no other but Mdlle. Tietjens has done in this country.

The operas performed during the week have been—Faust e Margherita (Monday); Otello (Tuesday); Don Giovanni (Thursday); and Hamlet (Friday). L'Africaine is announced for to-night (Saturday).

A NEW WORK BY M. BENOIT.*

The solemn inauguration of the mural paintings of MM. Guffens and Swerts took place, last Monday, in the Church of St. George, when a new musical work by the chief of our young Flemish school was performed. I shall not enter into all the details of the different ceremonies attending the inauguration, for it strikes me that I shall have quite enough to do even if I restrict myself to speaking of the important musical composition to which I have alluded. In the first place, I maintain that, thanks to this composition, Antwerp is occasioning a perfect revolution in sacred music by the introduction of the Flemish language therein. What is sometimes offered us under the pretence of its being sacred music? I shall never in all my life forget having been impelled by curiosity to enter a church on the occasion of some solemnity of anything but a cheerful character; I think it was during an octave for the dead. Well, I heard two singers cooing out a duet in the Italian style, with Latin words, which might very well have represented the bravadoes of two rivals. Then came the piercing cries of a soprano voice, evidently belonging to the first lady singer, whom the rage of her admirers sent into a fainting fit. Afterwards, to wind up, a martial chorus made you fancy you were listening to a troop of bravoes, with their left hands upon their hips, and their bright blades unsheathed, ready to cut down or pierce their foe. This was edifying, was not it? Such exhibitions, however, are more frequent than people imagine. Benoit's work alters all this. It drives the money-changers out of the Temple. What was the subject to be treated by the composer? We will commence by observing that the mural paintings of MM. Guffens and Swerts, considered in reference to the ideas they embody, represent under three different aspects the Church in three characters: the Church militant, the Church suffering, and the Church triumphant. This is pourtrayed in fourteen stations, to which must be added the paintings of the choir. The task to be accomplished, therefore, was to lend movement to each picture and render its character and expression by the aid of the music; to unite in one musical cluster the different objects, which, though connected perfectly with each as paintings, on account of the series of facts in them, offered a great difficulty to the composer: that of arranging the different objects homogeneously. To obtain a correct idea of the score, the reader must know that under each picture is inscribed the moral precept deduced from the fact depicted by the artist. Thus, before every strophe representing a picture, four voices were heard forming what in picturesque language might be called: the "stone chorus," as though four statues rose up and announced by the precept they sang the action about to follow. To complete his score, the composer has employed in his orchestration none but the strongest and most striking colours. He has introduced the organ, and, as a contrast to the organ, trombones and trumpets; as a delicate, though powerful connecting link between the organ and the brass, there were violoncellos and double-basses. After all, the subject, as represented, could not be treated with any other orchestration. It was what we may term a specimen of broad Flemish painting, whence secondary tones were excluded, so as to exhibit only the fundamental colours in all their vivacity and all their force. To the orchestra were added the group of choruses, and the soloists representing the different characters, including those sustaining the parts of narrators, the Steenen Chor.

This highly intelligent work strikes one by its extraordinary effects, of which the simple perusal of the score enables us perfectly to understand the causes. I must here beg permission to enter into certain technical details of the highest interest to the initiated. One fact which struck us, irrespective of any other harmonic consideration, is the musician's putting into practice the principle that the musical gamut results from education, based upon certain scientific data, it is true, but modified, if not in its fundamental essence, which is tonality, in the subsequent arrangement of the degrees without the tonic. Thus, for instance, the prejudices against the Ambrosian gamut, and the Gregorian gamut, are completely refuted in this work by the æsthetic fact of the real effect obtained. We will explain. It is asserted that modern musicians cannot express themselves except by means of the two fundamental gamuts admitted at the present day, all the rest being simply transpositions. Thus in the scene where Christ teaches the people to pray, the composer has employed the first church mode, called the Dorian (fifth century). The harmony based upon the intervals of this scale produces something indefinite, something divine, without the slightest offence to the ear from such a scale being introduced in conjunction with our modern scales. The scene of raillery where the people say: "Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee?" is written in the scale of B minor, C, D minor, E natural, F, G, A, B minor. It is, therefore, a modification of the natural scale which requires an E minor, and a D natural. This is remarkable, but the dominant F, at least, is preserved in its normal state. Now comes the scene with the High Priest, Caiaphas. This is written in the scale C, D, E, F sharp, G sharp, A, B, C; the dominant G sharp resolves directly into C, as if it was G natural. But the composer has not contented himself with producing this scale in an isolated manner; he has wished, as it were, to direct attention to the immense transition which takes place, when he falls abruptly from this scale into the natural scale of C, that is with F natural and G natural. Thus the High Priest puts his interrogations in the modified scale, and at the moment Christ replies: "Thou hast said it," the notes usually admitted re-appear; after this, the modified scale returns, and the scene, by an abrupt transition, ends in B minor. If I have specially mentioned this last instance, it is because everyone believed in the existence of an extraordinary modulation, when after all the composer had remained in the same tone, in C, by means of the modified scale. We think this is the first time anyone ever applied in a work of serious character, seriously carried out, the principle that the gamut results from education or civilization, with which it ought to progress, on condition of preserving its tonality. In concluding these didactic details we would call attention to the expressive part played by the consecutive fifths, either in slurred movement or in arpeggios, and, more especially, the exact preservation of the diminished fifth. Thus, while Christ says: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," we hear simultaneously, the fifths D, A, B, and F, repeated alternately five or six times, and producing an effect which is certainly strange and eccentric, but not inartistic. The following incident encouraged me to enter into these details. As I was leaving the church, I heard a woman, belonging to the lower classes, say that what had especially struck her was: the "Pater," Christ before the Judge, and the "Father forgive them, for they know what they do." This is, indeed, an instance of the maxim: Vox populi, vox Dei.

I should require far more space than that at my disposal, if I were to dwell analytically on all the details of the work, so I will content myself with merely directing attention to the intelligent manner in which each of the characters was embodied. The Steenen Chor supported admirably the part of intermediary between the different phases of the work, and infused in it that calm which constituted its unity. Then there was the character of the tenor—the Narrator, a person we find in the fine creations of Greece—by turns animated and placid, and rising to the highest dramatic effects, as in the scene before the High Priest, where the orchestra depicts so well the tortures endured by the Son of God. The rendering of the blows by the violoncellos, basses, and trombones, was the acme of realism. It is useless for me to dwell upon the part of Caiaphas, upon that of Judas, or upon that of the Demon—each enclosed in its own frame—each accompanied by an orchestration which colours so well its peculiar nature. The character the most difficult to seize was that of Christ, for barytone, preserving—despite the drama going on around—his serenity, his mansuetude, and his divine essence, especially in that admirable page, the "Pater." Who was not struck by, among other things, the procession to Calvary, where the basses pourtray so admirably the enormous weight of the instrument of punishment, rendering still more toilsome the weary progress of the Divine Martyr. Then, too, the sombre line of double-basses lowering like a shadow on the scene of the Crucifixion!

I will conclude by an account of the way in which the work was interpreted, for I should never come to an end were I to mention everything in the work itself.

The performance was directed by the composer in person. The smallness of the space for the executants was insufficient to accommodate the number of instrumentalists and singers necessary to produce in the introductory chorus, the Hosannah and the final chorus, the complete effect which those splendid pages ought to produce. The calmness and placidity of the Steenen Chors were admirable. MM. Van Ishoven, Rypens, Vanderoort, and Moerinckx, deserve praise for the way in which they interpreted the characters of St. John, of the High Priest, of the Demon, and of Judas. We cannot speak too highly of the really artistic manner in which MM. Colin gave the part of the Narrator (tenor), and that of Christ (barytone). They often approached perfection. The profound effect produced upon the audience is an irrefutable proof that, though the work is characterised by great qualities, it owes a part of its success to the intelligent musicians by whom it was interpreted. I trust I may be able to hear this remarkable Passion executed by the numerous elements which our city can supply. M. O. I.

REPORTS ON DISEASES OF THE THROAT.

By Prosser James, M.D., M.R.C.P.,
Lecturer on Materia Medica and Therapeutics at the London Hospital.

(From the "Medical Press and Circular.")

The history of the laryngoscope closely resembles that of many other inventions. We find that several persons at various intervals were intent on the endeavour to obtain a view of the interior of the larynx during life. Some, indeed, seem to have actually seen the glottis, others, without clearly defining them, discerned in a mirror parts otherwise invisible, and all succeeded more or less, according to the patience they brought to bear upon the problem, and the methods and instruments they employed. Thus it is that several persons only just missed being recognized as the inventors of the laryngoscope; and when at length the instrument was perfected and its value demonstrated more than one claimed a share in the honour of discovering so great an addition to our means of investigating and treating disease.

In what we may call the pre-laryngoscopic era, I had been much interested in diseases of the respiratory organs, and in one case had succeeded, as recorded in my work on "Sore Throat," in bringing into view and curing disease by the aid of reflected light. This established the principle of the laryngoscope; but at that period I had not the opportunity of following up the subject, nor do I profess to have foreseen its importance. The instruments I had constructed for an individual case were laid aside without any effort to improve them, so as to render them of daily use. This case was treated by me in 1856, and was recorded in the first edition of my work, which, though written in the interval, was not published till the end of 1859. In fact, on the announcement of the brilliant results obtained in Vienna by the very plan I had employed, the issue of the work was naturally delayed, in order to include in it an account of the subject.

It will be seen in the sequel that I put forward no claim to priority; though, being, at that time, unaware of what others had accomplished, I may feel justified in accepting the credit that is usually accorded to originality. Moreover, though anticipated by others in the use of reflected light for the purpose of diagnosis, it is not disputed that I was the first person to apply topical remedies by the aid of the faucial mirror. The development of laryngoscopal therapeutics has since been such that any one may well feel gratified at having taken a part in it at the very commencement; and here I cannot miss the opportunity of expressing once more my admiration of the late Dr. Horace Green, of New York, who had anticipated laryngoscopal therapeutics by working without the mirrors at all. In truth, I had only used mirrors to enable me to see what I was doing when attempting to carry out local treatment, as recommended by him.* This much premised, I continue the history as it presented itself to my own observation.

In 1858 Czermak's first announcement was made in the Wiener Mediz Wochenschrift, immediately after which he submitted to the Vienna Academy of Science an account of his experiments in a paper entitled "Physiological Researches with Garcia's Laryngoscope" (Physiologische Untersuchen mit Garcia's Kehlkopfspigel).

The title of this paper is very striking. Czermak here calls the instrument with which his first experiments were made Garcia's laryngoscope or larynx mirror. He had, as we know from his own statement, borrowed Garcia's instrument from Professor Turck, who had previously attempted to utilize it for diagnosis in the wards of the General Hospital at Vienna.

Garcia, an able professor of singing still living, had used his mirror to investigate the physiology of the voice, and that so successful that he had four years previously described to the Royal Society of London the appearances presented by the human larynx during life, as determined by experiments made on himself. He had, in fact, discovered and applied the art of auto-laryngoscopy. Nay, more, we are now told by Dr. Mandl * that in sending him a copy of his paper, Garcia had urged upon him to apply his method to the investigation of diseases of the larynx.

The paper of Garcia's was read at the Royal Society, and printed in the "Proceedings." Notices of it appeared in the continental papers, and attracted the attention of Professor Turck, who set to work to test the method. He does not seem to have been very successful, and this need not surprise us when we learn that he confined his efforts to the use of direct sunlight which, even in Vienna, is not always at the service of experimenters. Czermak soon found out the value of the mirrors Turck had lent him, and set to work to improve the method. He rendered himself independent of the weather by using artificial light, and he availed himself of the ophthalmoscopic mirror to bring the rays to a focus on the laryngoscope. Following up the discovery with the utmost enthusiasm, he perfected the apparatus, drew the attention of the medical world to the extensive field of research thus opened, and received in all directions the credit of being the discoverer of the laryngoscope. It is clear, however, that he was much indebted to others. But for Turck he might never have heard of Garcia's laryngoscope. While, therefore, we accord to Czermak the highest praise for his indefatigable efforts to popularize the method, and for the many improvements he effected in it, it is impossible to ignore the immense services that Garcia has rendered to our art, or to deny him the honour of priority in the discovery.

Garcia did not merely make a suggestion and leave others to test it. He completed the discovery of auto-laryngoscopy, and further, by means of that, he described to the most critical scientific body in the world the physiology of the human voice as demonstrated by his method. In the light of all that has since been done, the accuracy of the descriptions first recorded by this ingenious and scientific professor of singing is most remarkable. His paper would have done credit to expert anatomists and physiologists; and reading it now one cannot but wonder that the Royal Society did not confer some signal reward on its accomplished author.

Apart from its historical interest, this paper is so valuable that as it is somewhat inaccessible I here reprint it in full from the "Proceedings of the Society."

Laibach.—Herr Kaspar Maschek, formerly chorus-master and teacher of singing to the local Philharmonic Society, died lately, after a long illness, in his seventy-ninth year. His life was a hard struggle, full of privations almost to the last. But nothing could damp his ardour for his art. With trembling hand, and hardly able to sit up at the table, broken in body but still of good heart, he was writing at his last compositions—three dead marches—when death overtook him. The marches were played at his funeral.

Seville.—The Italian operatic season was inaugurated by Il Trovatore, with Madame Sass, Signori Barbacini and Verger. This was followed successively by Rigoletto, Lucrezia Borgia, La Traviata, and Robert le Diable. The principal artists, in addition to those already mentioned, are Signora Volpini, Signori Ugolini and David.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The annual Juvenile Festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was held on Wednesday. A celebration in which children play the most prominent part is always interesting, and sure to attract. The little folks, some four thousand strong, drew an audience that completely filled the transept and even encroached on the nave. It was obvious, too, that the efforts of the singers met with full appreciation. Each piece was listened to with attention, and at its close there followed frequent rounds of applause. The programme was divided into two parts, the first consisting exclusively of sacred pieces. These were given with remarkable clearness, the words in most cases being distinctly audible. This part of the programme included "Glory be to God" (Smart), "Breathless Silence" (Abt), "Sound the loud Timbrel" (Stevenson), Mendelssohn's part-song, "'Tis fore-ordained," and other works, which fully tested the performers. In the second part sacred music gave place to secular. The youthful vocalists had now full opportunity to display the vivacity which had previously been restrained. The chorus, "Laugh and grow fat," was rendered in such a waggish spirit that it had to be repeated. As a matter of course, the programme loyally concluded with the National Anthem. Not the least interesting attraction of the festival was the appearance of the little folks who took part in it. Mr. Joseph Proudman and Mr. W. G. McNaught were the conductors, and Mr. Coward presided at the organ, the only instrument by which the children were accompanied.

M. GOUNOD'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

(From an Occasional Contributor.)

An orchestral and choral concert, for the benefit of M. Gounod, took place at St. James's Hall on Saturday morning, the 31st ult., in presence of a numerous and fashionable auditory. The great composer's own choir, numbering about one hundred and twenty voices, together with a selected orchestra of seventy performers, including Messrs. Pollitzer, Peyton, Jacquinot, Burnett, Paque, Radcliffe, Hutchings, Harper, &c., formed, for a morning concert, an unusually attractive entertainment. Another source of interest consisted in the programme being made up solely of the works of M. Gounod:—

Part 1.—Sacred. Requiem, Ch. Gounod; "Abraham's Request," Ch. Gounod—Signor Gustave Garcia; "Gallia" (Lamentations), Chorus and soli, Ch. Gounod—Solo by Mrs. Weldon. Part 2.—Miscellaneous. Overture (Mireille), Ch. Gounod; Biondina, No. 5 ("Ho messo nuove corde"), Ch. Gounod—Herr Werrenrath; Funeral March of a Marionette (Fragment d'une Symphonie Grotesque), Ch. Gounod; Biondina, No. 1 (Biondina bella), Ch. Gounod; Biondina, No. 10 (Ier fu mandata), Ch. Gounod—M. Valdec; "I loved a lass," Pavane (16th century), "Oh, the sweet contentment," Pastorale (17th century), "Love me true," Jacques Lefevre (1745)—the Choir; Ballet (Faust), (first time of performance in London) Ch. Gounod; March (La Reine de Saba), Ch. Gounod.

The Requiem was exquisitely done, the assembly listening to the whole with the rapt attention the work so well deserves and so amply repays. The double-chorus, "Kyrie," produced, as it always does, a profound impression. The masterly writing contained in the ensuing numbers—the "Offertoire," "Sanctus," "Pie Jesu," and "Agnus Dei," vindicated, even if such vindication were necessary, the title of the gifted creator of Mephistopheles to rank with the first of ecclesiastical composers of any age or country. The counterpoint of the two last divisions of the Mass will, doubtless, in generations to come, be held up by master to scholar as amongst the choicest examples of musical learning the art affords. In a wondrous manner the "oldest of the old" is combined with the newest of the new: the tonic, the harmonic, the chromatic (the suggestive?); all these schools of writing, besides the composer's inimitable "mannerism," as some are pleased to call it (would a few more of our aspirants for publicity could catch a scintillation of such "mannerism;"—if I might be allowed to coin a word, I should call it "Hogarthism"), are here represented. It is evident the chromatic is inclined to; this is natural enough, leading, as it does most potently, to the "suggestive." This conclusion is, however, open to discussion.

Apart from musical considerations, it may be fairly questioned whether a constant reproduction of the "cadaveric phenomena" such as is met with in some French funeral religious services, of which this Requiem is a splendid specimen, is properly within the sphere of musical art. If, while it bewails the past, it speaks more assuredly of the future, then he must indeed be a cynic who would carp at such a service for the dead. "Sorrow is better than laughter," only "when by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better." Hence the "Agnus," in some hands, rises to a prediction of eternal felicity. M. Gounod appears, in a measure, to have caught this central idea, and his closing passages become, in the highest degree, fervently satisfactory. The accompaniments were rendered with the utmost delicacy and finish throughout. It was evident that the "Gallia" surpassed, in the estimation of the audience, even the grand conception that preceded it. The soprano solos were entrusted again to Mrs. Weldon, who created a very favourable impression. The magnificent perorations of the final chorus, "Convertere ad Dominum," supported by a phalanx of wind instruments, was almost overpowering. Three part-songs newly arranged were all the choir had else to do. The orchestra played the three other pieces on the programme and the ballet music in Faust in superb style. The Funeral March (grotesque) was encored. The songs were given by Signor Garcia, Herr Werrenrath, and M. Valdec, accompanied by the composer, who conducted the performance in his own inimitable manner. At the close a number of members of the First Guards' Band played a fanfare upon M. Gounod's "Farewell Gabrielle" as a compliment to the composer; Mr. Waterson, who had arranged the piece, conducting.

An exceedingly well written book of the words and descriptions of the music to be played was put into the hands of those present, as is now the custom at high class performances. G. T.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students of the Royal Academy of Music had a public rehearsal at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday afternoon. The following is the programme:—

"Overture (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Concerto in B flat, Organ (Mr. Walter Fitton), Handel; Aria, 'Un' aura amorosa' (Cosi fan Tutte) (Mr. Elmenhorst), Mozart; Concerto in E flat (Adagio and Rondo) pianoforte (Miss Taylor), W. S. Bennett; Selection (Acis and Galatea), Chorus—'Wretched lovers;' Recit.—'I rage, I melt, I burn,' Air—'Rüddier than the cherry' (Mr. Wadmore); Recit.—'His hideous love,' Air—'Love sounds the alarm' (Mr. Henry Guy); Trio—'The flocks shall leave' (Miss Nessie Goode, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Wadmore); Recit—'Help, Galatea' (Mr. Henry Guy); Chorus—'Mourn, all ye muses;' Recit.—''Tis done, thus I exert,' Air—'Heart, the seat of soft delight' (Miss Nessie Goode); Chorus—'Galatea, dry thy tears,' Handel; Concerto in E minor (first movement), violin (M. Mr. Walter Macfarren was the conductor.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

At a well-patronised entertainment given in this hall on Friday afternoon, Prince Poniatowski brought forward his Au Travers du Mur, an opéra-comique in one act, which was first played at the Théâtre Lyrique in May, 1861. The little work has the advantage of an agreeable plot and lively incidents, turning upon the accidental encounter at the same hotel of certain professional musicians, whose acquaintance, and the matrimonial relations springing therefrom, may be said to arise out of the thinness of the partition dividing their respective rooms. The music, always pleasant, is often charming in a high degree, and, as given on Friday, under the composer's own direction, it obviously delighted the entire audience. Au Travers du Mur was played with great spirit, not a little of its success being due to the effective vocalisation of Miss José Sherrington, and to the admirable singing and acting of M. Jules Lefort, who acquitted himself in all respects like an accomplished artist. Madame Abrek, Miss Purdy, Signor Frederic and Mr. Alfred Audran sustained their parts more or less well; and Signor Monari Rocca added much to the humour of the piece by his comical sketch of an inkeeper who assiduously practises the bass trombone. The operetta had a warm reception, and, at its close, the composer was heartily applauded.

Another interesting feature was the appearance of Mdlle. Marie Dumas in two of the delicate little monologues which she has made popular for some seasons past, under the title of Saynetes de Salon. The lady's performance in Gondinet's Oh! Monsieur, and Monselet's Les femmes qui font des scènes, illustrated the best style of French dramatic art, as shown in fine perception of minute shades of character, and in the power of throwing a large amount of significance into what appears the simplest and most natural act. Unaided as she was, Mdlle. Dumas brought the persons of her little dramas vividly before the eye, and most charmed those among her audience who could best appreciate her skill.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL AND SIGNOR SCHIRA.

The Daily Post gives the following account of a Festival Rehearsal:—

"Another stage in the work of preparation for the ensuing Birmingham Festival was reached, by the union of the various sections of the choir, in the Theatre of the Midland Institute, for the purposes of the first general choral rehearsal. For a first gathering, the attendance was very satisfactory, and the musical results not less so. The special subject of rehearsal was the choral portion of Signor Schira's new cantata, The Lord of Burleigh, which the composer himself had come down to Birmingham expressly to conduct. Signor Schira, a bright, pleasant, energetic Italian, in the prime of life, with a ready smile but a very determined beat, and the general air of a man who is equally ready at a pinch to conduct a choir or lead a regiment, was briefly introduced by Mr. Peyton, the orchestral steward, who usually presides at these rehearsals, and received a hearty welcome. Mr. Peyton stated that the fame of the Birmingham Festival choir had reached Signor Schira, even in his native city of Milan, and it was to be hoped they would not falsify report, or disappoint expectation. Signor Schira added a few words in broken English on his own account, which, however fragmentary and imperfect, amply served the speaker's purpose by raising a laugh, and putting composer and executants at once on easy terms; after which the rehearsal commenced. There is no need to describe in detail the efforts of the choir, which, though nominally in the nature of practice, were really so perfect that even the fastidious taste of the composer could find little in them to amend or modify; and with reference to the work itself, our hands are tied by other and obvious reasons. There can be no harm, however, in stating, as we have previously explained, that the subject is taken from Tennyson's well-known poem, narrating how a lord of high degree, in the disguise of a humble landscape painter, wooed and won a simple village maiden, for whose sensitive nature, unfortunately, the burden of her husband's high state proved too great; but Signor Schira's librettist has used little more than the story of the poem, which is set out in poetical forms and language, inferior, no doubt, to those of the laureate, but better adapted for the purposes of musical illustration. We gather from the choral parts that the work consists of thirteen numbers, of which seven are either choruses or choral combinations with the solo voice. Even if desirable, it would be impossible to form any trustworthy idea of the work from the choruses alone, without the explanatory connecting links, or orchestral clothing; but the choruses suffice at all events to show that Signor Schira possesses in a high degree the art of part-song writing, and that he fully understands the dramatic employment of vocal combinations. The general character of the music is festive and jubilant, inclining now to pastoral and anon to ecclesiastical jubilation; but, though generally bright and spirited, it is not all sunshine. There are graver episodes here and there, more especially towards the close, and the staccato choral commentary upon the death-like appearance of Lord Burleigh's village bride will, we think, prove one of the most effective, as it certainly is one of the most dramatic, of the choral numbers. Most of the choruses were tried over twice, but the trial was little more than formal, or in compliance with that prudence which seeks to make assurance doubly sure. Here and there, a little acceleration of the time, or a more marked emphasis of the contrasts of forte and piano, was indicated, but the general result was so satisfactory as to extort from the composer repeated and hearty expressions of approval. He only hoped, he said, that the other performers might execute their parts equally well."

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

The rehearsals of the Liverpool Representative Choir last week were the most satisfactory that have yet taken place, the members displaying an attention to tempo and the niceties of light and shade that must have gratified Mr. Sanders. At the rehearsal on Thursday evening the Mayor (Mr. E. Samuelson), Mr. Willert Beale, Mr. Fred. Beale, and Mr. J. B. Cooper were present. After hearing the various pieces rendered, the Mayor expressed himself highly pleased with the singing, which, he said, was creditable alike to the choir and their conductor. The quality of the voices, he thought, was capital; and he hoped and trusted the choir would show the metropolitans that Liverpool was not behind in musical ability. Mr. J. B. Cooper also addressed a few words of encouragement and advice to the members, who, he was sure, would prove worthy representatives of the good old town. The Renshaw Street Choir and St. Nicholas Choir, both of which are going from Liverpool to compete in Class IV. at the Crystal Palace, are working industriously at the pieces allotted to them, and seem bent on nothing less than conquest. Some members of these choirs also belong to the Representative Choir. It is announced that the open rehearsal of the South Wales Choral Union at Swansea, given recently, realised nearly 300*l*. It is to be hoped the Liverpool rehearsal will be no less fortunate. —Courier.

CHORAL FESTIVAL AT CANTERBURY.

The 12th annual meeting of parochial choirs in connexion with the Canterbury Diocesan Choral Union, was held on Tuesday in the Cathedral, and was one of the most successful gatherings that have occurred under the auspices of the society. The choirs were represented by 500 unsurpliced and 400 surpliced singers, supplemented by the cathedral choristers and lay clerks. The proceedings of the day commenced with the celebration of the Holy Communion (choral) in St. Margaret's Church, at 9 a.m., the festival service not beginning until half-past 3, to which hour the evening Divine worship in the Cathedral was deferred. There was, however, a rehearsal by the choirs in union in the morning, conducted by the Rev. J. G. Wood, precentor. At 20 minutes past 3 the procession of surpliced choirs, headed by the Rev. H. M. Villiers, left the Chapter House, the route and order of procession being as follows:—First came the several brigades in their order (each brigade consisting of one treble, two altos, three tenors, and four basses), then the clergy, and then the Cathedral choir and Chapter. Entrance to the Cathedral was gained by the Martyrdom door, and so to the south transept, when the processional hymn by the late Dean Alford, "Forward be our watchword," was commenced. As soon as the first brigade was in position the organist gave the key-note, and the whole of that detachment burst into song, the others following, the same rule being observed by those which came after. It occupied just 20 minutes for the long trains of choristers to move from the cloisters outside the Chapter House until the whole of those forming the procession had entered the choir by the screen door and taken their seats. The entire congregation, about 4,000 persons, joined in singing the last verse of the processional hymn. The effect was very impressive, and the rendering of that and the remainder of the choral service showed a marked improvement on former years. The evening service was intoned by the Rev. R. Hake, precentor; and the Canticles, Psalms, and hymns were rendered under the direction of the Rev. J. G. Wood, who acted as precentor. Anglican chants were executed in very good taste, and the anthem, "Glory to the Lord" (Goss) was creditably got through by the aid of the Cathedral lay clerks and choristers. In point of vocal efficiency the society has never celebrated so successful an anniversary.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

The management of the Imperial Operahouse, under the presidency of Herr Richard Lewy, temporarily at the head of the institution, has decided on postponing for a short time the production of M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. The principal reason assigned is that they have not yet made up their minds who shall sing Ophelia. So much, however, is certain: Madame Schröder-Hanfstängel will not sustain the part, as was asserted. Nor does it appear certain that Madame Wilt will replace her, since Herr Lewy has expressed a wish to hear Mdlle. Proska, a pupil of the Conservatory, and if that young lady gives satisfaction, it is she who will probably be charged with the character. Rather a responsible task for a novice.

Madame Schmidt-Zimmermann, from Dresden, has appeared as Elsa in Herr Wagner's Lohengrin. She produced individually a good impression, but the opera generally dragged in a terrible manner, and the audience had quite enough of the Swan-drawn hero long before the final fall of the curtain.

The Duke Augustus of Coburg-Gotha lately gave a musical Soirée, at which the Emperor, all the Princely visitors in Vienna, and all the high aristocracy were present. The programme, drawn up by Herr Proch, Imperial Capellmeister, contained: From Shakespere's Henry VIII., by Lindblad, "Bröllopsmarsch" ("Wedding March"), Södermann, for four female voices (sung by the Swedish Ladies'-Quartet—Hilda Wideberg, Amy Aberg, Maria Petterson, and Wilhelmina Söderlund). Saloon Piece for Violoncello, composed and executed by Herr D. Popper, soloist at the Imperial Operahouse. Cavatina from Maria di Rohan, Donizetti, sung by Madame Caroline Gomperz-Bettelheim. "Der Neugierige," Schubert, and "Frühlingslied," Gounod, sung by Herr Walter. Fantasia on motives from Luisa Miller, Verdi, for two harps, by Professor A. Zamara, and played by him and his daughter, Theresa. "O wenn es doch immer so bliebe," Rubinstein, sung by Herr Walter. "Frühlingsnacht," Schumann, sung by Madame Caroline Gomperz-Bettelheim. Serenade, Lindblad, and "Horch! Horch!" Eisenhofer, sung by the Swedish Ladies'-Quartet.

RUBINSTEIN

(From the "Arcadian," May 29.)

An immense assemblage of Mr. Rubinstein's friends gathered in Steinway Hall, on Thursday evening, to bid him farewell before his departure for Europe on Saturday. The concert hardly admits of criticism as a performance, since the programme consisted entirely of the pianist's compositions, and above all others a composer is supposed to know the correct interpretation of his own works. The programme, as in nearly all the concerts, was too long, consisting of thirty-two pieces, eight of which had to be omitted, owing to the lateness of the hour. We may doubt whether Mr. Rubinstein would not have left a more agreeable impression with us if he had not chosen to perform, at this his last concert, an entire programme of his own music. The audience was, however, very enthusiastic; and, after the last piece, rather uninteresting variations on "Yankee Doodle" called him out again and again.

It would seem to be a fitting occasion, as this is the close of Mr. Rubinstein's American career, to examine critically his claims both as a performer and composer. In each aspect, the same term may be applied to him—a man of immense talent but with no appreciable amount of genius. He is to-day, without doubt, the second player in the world, the Abbé Liszt being the first; but it is a question whether his influence, or even his fame, will much outlast his own life. And from this cause: with all his wonderful execution, variations of touch, contrasts of the most powerful with the most delicate playing ever heard in this country, nevertheless he hardly ever moves the listener to anything more than admiration at his skill; in a word, he plays with a great deal of taste but with little feeling. It is more than doubtful whether his temporary influence over the piano playing here will be for good, and for the following reason:—He has made his reputation, and no longer cares to play with the extreme accuracy that is needful for a young player in order to reach any high degree of excellence. Players recognize a portion of this, and already we are commencing to hear them say, "Rubinstein produces great effects without particular accuracy. Why should not I try to do the same?"—forgetting that Mr. Rubinstein can play with perfect accuracy, if he wishes, and that a man with a recognized reputation can do—though it is a question if he has a right to do—things that will not be pardoned in a younger performer.

Mr. Rubinstein has a most wonderful memory, but often he trusts too much to his knowledge of harmony and of the spirit of the composer whose music he is playing in order to supplement any failure of it with improvisations of his own. This was especially notable upon the "Schumann day," for on that occasion he, in two or three instances, forgetting the score, inserted bar after bar of his own until his memory supplied the missing links in the music. Again, he is very apt to take his time much too fast, no doubt from his great facility of execution. On the other hand, his technique is absolutely perfect; every note is distinctly audible, no matter how fast he plays; his arpeggios are neither slurred nor broken; his octave playing has never been equalled here except by the late H. Sanderson, and his runs and trills are above praise. If it had not happened that he had been heard in Chopin and Beethoven, the question would naturally have arisen whether it was not the fault of the instrument that he produced so little effect upon the hearer; but these composers' works, not nearly so well played, have often caused a much deeper and more lasting impression upon the hearer's mind. We have said that he plays with more taste than feeling, but that hardly expresses all, and at the same time too much. Perhaps the difficulty is that there is very seldom any mean between the extremes of loudness and softness; that there is always somewhere or other in the piece he happens to be playing a harsh contrast that breaks the flow of the melody, and leaves a disagreeable impression, which the succeeding portions, no matter how well played, do not remove. Finally, he is a player about whom no two people have a similar opinion.

Concerning his compositions the same difficulty in criticism occurs. They are so plainly not original, and yet it is so hard to pick out even a bar and say this is not Mr. Rubinstein's. It may be that in the present state of music it is impossible for a man perfectly familiar with the works of other composers to sit down and, according to the received laws of harmony, produce anything new. If he wishes to do this, he must cut loose from old traditions, good as they may be, doing as Wagner has done; in that case he may do something to advance music, but he will never do so by merely re-arranging old forms. Not that Mr. Rubinstein has done this knowingly; but it is impossible for a man, working as he has done, to help doing so. His very ability to compose in all styles, as shown on Thursday, proves him only a pupil, not a master. If a general description of his music were demanded, we should say it is Schubert's treated as Schumann; but, like all general rules, this has so many exceptions that it nearly ceases to be a rule. His orchestral music has been little played here; besides the "Ocean Symphony" and an overture, we believe, nothing of his has ever been produced in this country. He understands the capabilities of the orchestra, and writes perfect—from the purely harmonic stand-point—if not particularly original music. He never relies upon the orchestra for an effect he cannot get; but, again, he never produces any great effects at all. His leading is a strange contrast to his piano-playing. In the latter he seems always striving after something to startle and excite; in the former everything is to be smoothed by long crescendos or diminuendos. Nevertheless, he seems to understand the new use of the brass that has lately sprung up, though he is reported to be a strong opponent of the modern school. Knowing so little of his orchestral music as we do, it is hardly fair to judge of it. In every kind of composition, however, he seems to have trusted more to hard work than inspiration. And, as before said, he is a man of talent, but not of genius.

THE LATE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AND MDME. CARADORI ALLAN.

The Ancient Concerts—that venerable institution patronized and delighted in by George III.—were managed by several royal and noble directors, who each had a concert under his especial superintendence and fostering, with the privilege of selecting the music to be performed and the singers to interpret it. The directors used to dine together previous to the concert, and the conductor was always invited to join them. The court used to attend, and there was always a grand gathering of rank, fashion, and beauty connected with it.

For the last ten years of their existence I was engaged as one of the violoncellists in the orchestra, and I observed that some of the directors had such a lasting regard for certain time-honoured morceaux and certain time-honoured favourite singers that they were always sure to be included in the programmes of their especial evenings, year after year.

His late R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, who, it was said, had great difficulty in repressing any thought that was in his mind, on one occasion, that clings to my memory, was director of the evening; and as he had always entertained a great admiration for the charming talent of Mdme. Caradori Allan, who was then gradually seceding from her public position; from the natural consequence of advancing years having somewhat dimmed the lustre of her talents, she was engaged as one of the vocalists.

Between the parts of the concert, when the artists had retired to the refreshment room, the Duke came round in the usual exercise of his good nature, to congratulate and compliment the principals on their efforts, and to notice and say a kind word to any others that he knew. He approached Mdme. Caradori Allan, and, in shaking hands with her, said: "Ah! Madame Caradori, how d'ye do. How d'ye do. How well you sang. You and I have known each other a good many years you know—a good many—and how well you look too, very well, indeed, for an old one; very well indeed." Mdme. C. A.'s face was a study. Her desire to look pleased, and the evident difficulty she had in trying to repress an antagonistic feeling naturally arising from so doubtful a compliment, however well intended, was most amusing, particularly as all the surrounding artists who heard it were positively unable to avoid the indulgence of a smile and a twinkle of the eyes at the speech and the embarrassed position she was in.—"Journal and Jottings" by Henry W. Goodban.

TURIN.—An opera-buffa, Il Cadetto di Guascogna, by Signor Deferrari, has been successfully produced at the Teatro Rossini. The principal parts are sustained by Signora Repetto, Signori Karl and Graziosi.

"THE MAID OF ORLEANS."

SONATA FOR THE PIANOFORTE,* composed expressly for, and dedicated to, Mdme. ARABELLA GODDARD, by WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT.

ANYTHING from the pen of our representative English composer—the author of the Naiads overture, of the Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, and of the Woman of Samaria—demands more than ordinary attention, and we shall make no apology for giving up our leading columns to a notice of the above interesting work. Sir Sterndale Bennett unfortunately does not permit us the chance of often paying him the honour, and this supplies the greater reason why the present opportunity should be seized, especially as, in his new sonata, we discern a work of the highest value and beauty.

The Maid of Orleans, few musical readers need telling, is not Sir Sterndale's first work in the department of "programme music." His overture Paradise and the Peri belongs, indeed, to the few examples of that class of writing which combine the utmost perfection of symmetry with the greatest amount of descriptive truth. It tells the story well, and at the same time throws around it the glamour of that higher poetry which, in music, begins where the poetry of language ends. Sir Sterndale was, therefore, entitled to persevere in a course so successfully begun, and to demand for his sonata the respectful hearing won by past achievement in the school to which it belongs.

The work is divided into four parts, the orthodox number of movements being thus secured, although the exigencies of the "programme" necessitates departure from orthodox form and character. In the first of these parts, entitled we are introduced to Joan as she tends her flock among the pastures surrounding her native village. The motto of the movement is a quotation from Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans:—

"IN THE FIELDS,"

"Schuldlos trieb ich meine Lämmer Auf des stillen Berges Höh," thus paraphrased:—

"In innocence I lead my sheep
Adown the mountain's silent steep."

The movement itself, an Andante pastorale in A flat major, is not only pervaded by a spirit of absolute peace, but inevitably suggests the dreamy meditation of the incipient enthusiast. The latter is a point not to be overlooked—one which shows how thoroughly the composer studied his subject. Sir Sterndale might have contented himself with simply pastoral music, but his aim was to unite with such music a reflection of the heroine's individuality, and, in our opinion, he has succeeded, while preserving local colour and artistic beauty. Thus the movement begins:—

The false accent marked by the sf. in bar 2, independently of its charming effect, foreshadows a very distinctive feature of the movement, viz., a large use of syncopation, by which means the composer conveys an idea of freedom from restraint not otherwise possible. A transition is directly made to the dominant of E flat major, by means of a two-bar passage in nine-eight measure. Here we have the first of a series of such time-changes; inasmuch, however, as the triplet remains the basis of the entire movement, shifting from one multiple of three to another is simply a matter of convenience in notation. At the end of the passage referred to the twelve-eight measure is resumed, and the following graceful and original second subject makes its appearance:—

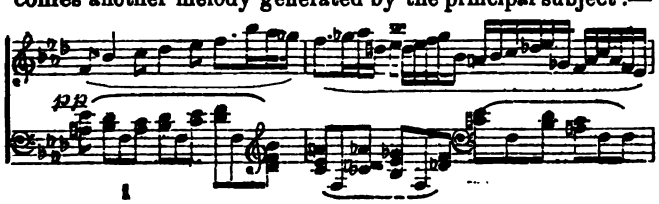
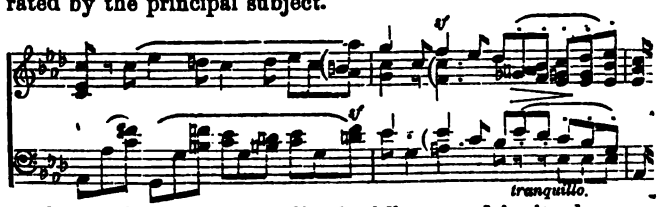
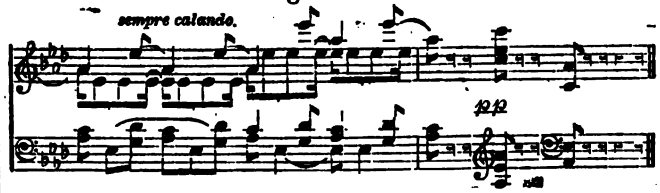
which, after repetition, is followed by a réprise of the leading theme itself in its original key. The two bars of nine-eight measure reappear, and lead into B flat minor, but not to the subject quoted (No. 2) above. Instead of this comes another melody generated by the principal subject:—



The two bars (nine-eight measure) that immediately follow are the counterparts of those already twice referred to, and precede a repetition of the second theme (see quotation No. 2) in the dominant key. A modulatory passage, corresponding to that which followed this subject in the first instance, leads back to the tonic, whereupon we have another melody (half in C minor and half in A flat) generated by the principal subject.



The final cadence immediately follows, and in it, also, we are reminded of the leading theme:—



Thus appropriately ends a story of Joan's shepherd life and "maiden meditation," which seems more suggestive and beautiful the more it is studied.

THE FAREWELL OF THE OPERA.

(From the "New York Herald.")

Maretzek's Italian Opera Company sang their adieux to the American public last night. The Academy of Music was crowded, every seat being sold, and many were compelled to content themselves with standing room only. There is little to add to our previous remarks on the opera, Mignon, except that Lucca was in glorious voice and spirits, and portrayed the heroine of Goethe to the life, and Miss Kellogg gave the rôle of Felina with more than usual fire. Her singing of the "Polonaise" was of such a brilliant character that she was compelled to repeat it. The same was the case with Lucca's "Styrienne." The season which closed last night was successful in a pecuniary as well as artistic point of view. Mdme. Lucca appeared 104 times in opera, and Miss Kellogg about 80 times. The gross receipts of the season, commencing September 30, and ending last night, amount to $450,000. About six thousand dollars represented the house last evening. Mr. Maretzek has made some very important engagements for the next season, commencing in October. The principal artists of his company are Mdme. Pauline Lucca, Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, a great favourite in Europe, and, as a bravura singer, the first on any stage; Mdme. Natalie Testa, a contralto of rare ability, and a few years back the reigning favourite in New York; Tamberlik, the prince of tenors, discoverer of the ut de poitrine, and a human trumpet in tours de force; Vizzani, Mari—a baritone very highly spoken of—and Jamet. Such a powerful combination is strong enough to hold the field against all competitors.

---

Mr. Cellier, whose music to Charity Begins at Home was highly appreciated during its long run at the Gallery of Illustration, gives a special morning performance next Tuesday, at this popular place of amusement, when Dora's Dream, an operetta, adapted from the French by Mr. Arthur Cecil, the music to which has been composed by Mr. Cellier, will be produced for the first time, and sustained by Mr. Arthur Cecil and Miss Fanny Holland. Mr. Corney Grain is announced to follow with one of his amusing sketches; and the entertainment will conclude with Charity Begins at Home—a work that will bear constant repetition without becoming tiresome. Mrs. German Reed and the whole of her small but talented company have consented to appear in it, and revive the original cast, which attracted large audiences during 236 representations.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

One of the fashionable musical events of the London season is the annual concert of Herr Kuhe, which always attracts the crême de la crême of "society" wherever and whenever it takes place. This year Mr. Kuhe summoned his friends to the Floral Hall, which was filled on Monday with an audience brilliant with hats, bonnets, and costumes as a modern flower garden, and completely filling the vast expanse. The programme was as usual gigantic in its proportions and varied in quality so as to suit all tastes, though, as a rule, those morceaux which please the tastes of drawing room dilletanti were in the majority. The artists were worthy of the programme, both as to quantity and quality, comprising the principal members of Mr. Gye's operatic troupe with the addition of Miss Edith Wynne, Mdme. Néruda, M. Waefelghem, M. Paque, and Mr. Alfred Thomas. Mr. Kuhe sets a rare example of modesty (well worthy of imitation by other bénéficiaires) at his annual concert, confining himself to a limited share of the programme, and rarely attempting music beyond his means, though that would not be very easy for him to find. On the present occasion he joined Mdme. Néruda, M. Paque, and M. Waefelghem in one of Beethoven's pianoforte quartets. He also played two pieces of his own, a caprice and an étude de concert, a nocturne by Chopin, and Lacombe's La Torrent, with his usual finish and elegance of style. Mr. Gye's two prime donne, Mdme. Patti and Mdlle. Albani, of course, carried off the lion's share of the applause. The former sang, "Ah non credea," and "Ah non giunge," as well as "Within a mile of Edinboro' town" in response to the encore awarded to a most feeling delivery of "Kathleen Mavourneen." The Canadian artist, by way of contrast, roused intense enthusiasm by an expressively effective delivery of "Robin Adair," and the "Last Rose of Summer," the latter in response to an encore loud and deep. The gem of the concert, however, was the duet, "La dove prende," by Mdme. Patti and M. Faure. It is needless to descant on the rare vocalism of these two unique artists, who, with such exquisite music, created an effect which satisfactorily proved that the public at even a morning concert can appreciate a lovely melody sung to perfection. We have no space for further details, suffice it to say that, long as was the concert, the majority of the audience heroically sat it out.—J. H. N.

The second of the series of Mr. Otto Booth's chamber concerts took place on Thursday evening (June 5th,) at St. George's Hall. Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, Schumann's in E flat, and Haydn's in G, (Op. 15), constituted the concerted pieces, which were faithfully interpreted by Messrs. Booth, Dando, Richard Blagrove, and Signor Pezze, with Mr. Henry Parker as pianist. Schumann's quartet was well played, the pianoforte part being cleverly executed by Mr. H. Parker. Mr. Otto Booth displayed his talents as a violinist in an andante and finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, which he performed excellently, receiving well-merited applause. Miss Edith Crawford, in a new and pretty song by Mr. Booth, "Pretty little warbler, stay," was encored, and Mr. Steadman, in two songs, pleased very much.

Among the more interesting of last week's benefit concerts was that given in Dudley House by Mdlle. Le Brun, a pianist of undoubted talent. The young lady seeks distinction in the highest branch of her profession, as appeared by her choice of works. She first joined MM. Straus and Daubert in Mendelssohn's favourite Trio (Op. 66), subsequently playing Beethoven's "Waldstein" sonata, and smaller pieces by Bach, Schumann, Heller and Chopin. Such music exacts great powers for even a moderately good performance, and it is saying much for Mdlle. Le Brun when we state that her reading and execution, whether of Beethoven on the one hand, or of Heller on the other, showed the unmistakable merits of a well-trained and intelligent artist who may aspire to take a far higher position than she has yet reached. The solos of Herr Straus (violin) and Herr Daubert (violoncello) were welcome features in the programme; while in Signor Gardoni, the young bénéficiaire had a vocalist whose appearance can never be other than most welcome. Nobody needs reminding of Signor Gardoni's elegant style, pure method, and great intelligence—merits which for many years have kept him in the first rank of public favourites. But it is fitting that his re-appearance in London should be mentioned as a subject for congratulation on the part of all who recollect the pleasure conferred by him in the past, and who can appreciate art which long experience has doubly refined. The other singers were Mdlle. Valdi, Mdme. and Signor Garcia; the accompanists were Prince Poniatowski and Signor Randegger.

Miss Florence Wydford, a vocalist possessing an excellent voice, gave a concert on Monday evening at the Cavendish Rooms, which was well attended. Miss Wydford sang some songs in a pleasing style, which were not, however, in the programme. The same remark applies to several of the other vocalists. Miss Wydford was assisted by Miss A. Pulham, Miss S. Cole, Miss Horder with Messrs. H. Gordon, T. Beale, Kenselt, C. P. Mann, and Mr. Pelissier. Mr. Pelissier gave in excellent style some songs by Ricci and Prince Poniatowski. Mr. C. P. Mann presided at the pianoforte.

Mr. Charles Gardner's ninth annual concert took place last Saturday in the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square. Mr. Gardner had a large attendance of his friends and pupils. The programme was attractive and varied. Mr. Gardner displayed his ability as a pianist in several pieces in both the modern and classic school of pianoforte music. He played Beethoven's duet for pianoforte and violoncello, in G, with Herr Daubert; and, with the same artist and Herr J. Ludwig, Sir Sterndale Bennett's Trio (Op. 26), J. B. Cramer's "La Ricordanza," two of his own compositions, "Chant d'amore," and a slow movement from a sonata; closing the concert with two pieces by J. Raff, and a Lieder ohne Worte by Mendelssohn, in all of which he was much applauded. Miss Katherine Poyntz, in Lotti's song, "Pur dicesti," sang with artistic feeling, and was deservedly applauded. Madame Anne Regan-Schimon gave some German Lieder, including Schubert's "Wohin" (encored). Miss Marion Severn, in a song of Blumenthal's, and, with Miss K. Poyntz and Mr. W. H. Cumming, in a new trio by the latter, "A land where beauty cannot fade," was heard to advantage. Mr. Cummings gave a French romance by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and a song by Pinsuti, with his usual excellence, and joined Miss K. Poyntz in a duet by Miss A. M. Smith. Mr. A. Stephens gave Tito Mattei's song, "Odi tu," and Herr J. Ludwig played Handel's Violin Sonata in A with capital effect. Messrs. Walter Macfarren, Adolph Schimon, and C. Gardner presided alternately at the pianoforte.

Mr. Brinley Richards' concert, on Thursday evening, in the Hanover Square Rooms, was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. The vocalists were Miss Sophie Ferrari, Miss Mary Davies, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and the St. Thomas's Choir, under the direction of Signor Randegger. Mr. Brinley Richards, the only instrumentalist, played some of his most admired pianoforte pieces, to the evident satisfaction of his patrons. Particulars in our next.

PROVINCIAL.

Dublin.—J. S. Curwen, Esq., a well-known advocate of the tonic sol-fa system of teaching music, delivered a lecture in the Ancient Concert Rooms. There was a large attendance. The lecture was illustrated by a choir of 150 voices. Mr. W. H. Smith officiated as conductor. During the proceedings, Mr. Smith, who is about leaving Dublin, having been appointed head master of Bishop Foy's school, was presented with an address and a beautifully finished writing table, in recognition of his valuable and successful services as conductor of the association for many years past.—Waterford Mirror.

AMERICAN CRITICISM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—American criticisms, next, perhaps, to Mark Twain's stories, are the "tallest things" in current literature. When the gentlemen who represent the Herald, Tribune, and other New York papers, go to the theatre, particularly if a lady artist "takes the boards," they by no means content themselves with a review of her histrionic and vocal capabilities, but go in for the tout ensemble, and are as minute in their delineation of her various "points" as if the lady were Mr. Bruce's Birmingham prize heifer, or a greyhound running for the Waterloo cup. "She is perfectly splendid," writes one of the critics recently, speaking of Madame Vanzini, "action, figure, expression never surpassed"—"the sweetest creature that ever walked the stage," &c. One can fancy the trepidation with which an actor or a singer faces for the first time these Argus-eyed "gentlemen of the press." Doubtless, Mdme Vanzini is used to it by this time; besides, she has made her mark, and moreover, possesses many of these attributes. But imagine the nervousness of a lady or gentleman who, though conscious of a fine voice and elocution, may be also conscious of some frailty of form or face, which in London or Paris would be passed over by the critics as a private and personal matter, not within their province of remark. Imagine a prima donna being told that her vocalization would have been perfect "had it not been marred by the too palpable contortions of a rather scraggy neck and bust." Conceive of the sciatic spasm of indignation which would pervade the heart and limbs of a danseuse if, at her breakfast next morning, she were to read that "Mdlle. Bandileggini captivated old and young alike in the lighter ranges of the ballet, but for the pas de soleil her calves were too elephantine." Fancy, too, the smothered rage of a popular tragedian, who, having conquered the old world, is told in New York that he is "unfit to handle tragedy until he has undergone an operation for squint." And yet it may come to this by-and-bye, unless the tendency to gross materialism in criticism, and the pandering to personal curiosity, which is already the bane of the New York press in other directions, is checked by the growth of better taste.—Yours ever,

T. Gulp, M.D.

Madame Pauline Lucca and Mdlle. Ilma di Murska are engaged to play in Italian opera in new York next "fall."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The following account of the composition and performance of Signor Arditi's Ode, in commemoration of the late Prince Albert, given at the Crystal Palace fête on Tuesday, appeared in the Daily News:—

"At four o'clock the grand musical performance commenced—in the Handel orchestra—the first part of the programme having been devoted to the Ode specially prepared for the occasion; previously to which the National Anthem was given, by chorus, orchestra, and organ, conducted by Mr. Manns. The Ode—tributary to the memory of the late Prince Consort—is written by Mr. Willert Beale (Walter Maynard). On its words, Signor Arditi has constructed a cantata, in which the contrasts and varieties of solo, choral and orchestral effects, are displayed with great practical skill and knowledge of these resources. A short, dirge-like orchestral introduction leads to the choral 'Invocation,' in which is some effective writing for the male choir. This is well relieved by the brighter tone of the following 'Chorus of Angels,' chiefly female voices. The next division consists of a tenor recitative and air, interspersed with occasional obbligato trumpet passages. Mr. Vernon Rigby was the singer, and his performance was much applauded. The next stanza—'The Angel of Plenty'—is assigned to a solo soprano. A short recitative—somewhat in the old style—leads to an aria, containing alternate sostenuto and florid passages, in which Mdlle. Tietjens' fine voice and artistic style were favourably displayed. This piece was received with especial applause. The duet for the two Angels is smoothly written for soprano and contralto voices (somewhat in the manner of Rossini); and has a characteristic feature in the interspersed echo, by a distant trumpet, of some of the vocal phrases. Admirably sung by Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Patey, the duet was loudly applauded. The chorus which follows contains some bold and massive effects, with occasional points of free imitation—some rich vocal harmonies being obtained by the four divisions of the choir being occasionally sub-divided into five, six, and sometimes seven parts. This chorus is well sustained, and terminates with a coda, Largamente, subsiding into a close on a prolonged chord, in full vocal harmony, pianissimo. The prayer commences—after a few introductory notes of recitative for bass solo—with unaccompanied choral harmony, followed by the entry of the orchestra, the four solo voices, and occasional phrases, for separate chorus of female voices. The final chorus—with its supplementary 'Laudate'—brings into full play the entire power of orchestra, organ, choir, and solo voices—the harp being prominently used in the instrumental accompaniments. There is some spirited writing in this movement which brought the Ode to a very effective close, and was followed by a prolonged tribute of applause rendered to Signor Arditi, who conducted the performance of his work. Although Signor Foli's share in the solo music was less prominent than that of the other artists named, his fine bass voice was of great value in various concerted passages. The Crystal Palace band and choir were largely augmented for the occasion—the latter by the London contingent of the Handel Festival chorus—the total number of performers having been, as stated 2,500. Dr. Stainer presided at the organ. The second part of the festival concert—conducted by Mr. Manns—consisted of a miscellaneous selection; among the most effective pieces being the choral prayer from Mosé in Egitto (encored), and Mr. Brinley Richards' patriotic part-song, 'God bless the Prince of Wales.' The tenor solos in the latter were sung by Mr. Vernon Rigby, and the piece was received with great enthusiasm."

DIANE DE LYS.

Nearly twenty years after its first production at the Gymnase the Diane de Lys of M. Alexandre Dumas fils has been brought out at the Princess's Theatre, the Lord Chamberlain having withdrawn the prohibition which rendered its previous production legally impossible. The principal part was played by Mdlle. Aimée Désclée. The high reputation of the young artist in Paris is scarcely four years old, and was established in the first instance by her appearance as Diane, originally sustained by Madame Rose Chéri.

There is much in the plot of Diane de Lys to remind one of the old story of Heloise. That learned but frail young lady allowed herself to become the mistress of her preceptor in philosophy. Diane, conscious that she is in want of a guide, elects a young man to be her moral teacher, and illicit passion is the result. Both parties in the modern tale—Diane and the painter, Paul Aubrey—start with the very best intentions, and both find themselves on the high road to that place to which good intentions proverbially afford the pavement.

No persons could be more different from each other at the beginning than the lady and the artist. Diane, neglected by her husband, the Comte de Lys, apparently one of those convenient gentlemen who regard the marriage contract as a treaty of mutual independence, manifests a strong contempt for the conventions by which society is regulated, and takes an odd pleasure in risking her good name. Towards actual evil she has no inclination, but to the appearance of evil she has not the slightest objection, and the scandals of which she is the subject do not arise solely from the malice of the calumniators. She meets, by appointment, a certain Vicomte for whom she does not care in the least, in the atelier of a painter, whom she does not know, and who has lent the room for the purpose of the interview; she ransacks the painter's drawers in his absence, she leaves her ring behind her when she departs, and she allows the Vicomte to bring the painter to her house, and leave him there till past midnight, the tête-à-tête being interrupted by the arrival of another visitor, during whose presence the painter, who she now sees for the first time, is secreted in her chamber. Innocence, in short, amuses itself by playing at guilt. Paul Aubrey, the painter, on the other hand, who is compelled against his will to participate in all these improprieties, is, except for a liaison with his model, an extremely high-principled man. Instead of taking advantage of the opportunity that is thrust upon him, he points out to Diane the folly of her conduct, and shows the danger to which she would be exposed if a man less honourable than himself were in his position. The modern Ulysses does not close his ears to the voice of the Siren, but counsels her to employ her song to a better purpose. Struck with admiration of the teacher and doctrine taught, Diane declares that Paul shall be her guide in the path of prudence, and Paul cheerfully accepts the responsibilities of the office. This is the moral situation of the personages at the end of the second of the two acts.

Before the third act has begun the relation between Paul and Diane has changed, violent love on both sides having succeeded to the calm sentiment that should have prevailed between master and pupil. Diane is visible to no one but the painter, and scandal, which before fired its shots at random, has now a distinct target at which it can aim. The lady is almost openly told that she has an "amant," and the charge simply gives aliment to her audacity. She will not break off her connection with Paul, but, on the contrary, she determines on taking him with her, in spite of his remonstrances, to a fashionable ball. In the meanwhile, the eyes of the Comte, who is not the easy personage we have been led to believe, are opened by his sister, who has maliciously watched his wife's proceedings; and, appearing in Paris when he is least expected, he insists that Diane shall accompany him on a diplomatic mission to Germany. She is at first contumacious, but ultimately consents to be taken to her father's house at Florence, with a view to a final separation.

Now comes a tale of lawless passion, in which both Paul and Diane have utterly lost the power of self-control. Stopping at Lyons, on his way to Florence, the Comte, having discovered that he loves his wife more than he imagined, proposes a reconciliation; but the painter has followed in their track, and Diane is on the point of eloping with him. The Comte, who surprises the guilty pair just as they are about to carry their plan into execution, calmly tells Paul that if he ever again troubles his domestic peace he will certainly kill him. The connection seems now to be broken off. Weeks have elapsed, and the painter, who is once more in Paris, and has heard nothing of Diane, has serious thoughts of marriage. But the dangerous lady suddenly re-appears, having come all the way from Florence, and she and Paul indulge in dreams of future happiness till these are dispersed by the Comte, who suddenly enters the atelier and kills Paul with a pistol-shot.

We can perfectly understand the difficulty felt by the Chamberlain in dealing with this piece. Immoral it certainly is not. The danger of encouraging a sentiment which is commonly called "Platonic," and has been a fertile source of social evil, is clearly illustrated, and guilt is punished with the severity which characterised the author's treatise of last year, L'Homme-Femme. We think that in the case of Diane de Lys the Chamberlain has acted judiciously in reconsidering his verdict. That M. Dumas intended to teach morality there is not a doubt; and whatever mischief might be caused by the example of Diane and Paul is greatly counteracted by the pains which he has taken to depict the character of the Comte, who, apparently frivolous at first, afterwards steps forth as a man stern in his sense of right, and who, at the end of the piece, is the most interesting person on the stage, standing as the embodiment of an unswerving adherence to principle, in opposition to the weak Paul, whose early morality was but the result of fortunate circumstances.

Those who take interest in a play as a work of art will seldom find characters more elaborately and consistently delineated than the Comte, Diane, Paul, and a cynical painter named Taupin, who has little to do with the plot. There is not an incident in the piece that is not fully accounted for by the idiosyncracy of the personages; and we are not aware of any piece in any language in which an exact counterpart of the wayward Diane is to be found.

The performance of the piece at the Princess's merits all praise. The restless disposition of Diane declares itself in every feature of Mdlle. Désclée, who has the art of expressing, by the minutest touches, the most powerful emotions. M. E. Barbe is, perhaps, somewhat overweighted by the important part of Paul, but the Comte could not be more adequately represented than by M. Maurice Coste, nor do we often see a more finished "bit" of character than the cynic, Taupin, as played by M. Schey.

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

By Joseph Seiler.

From time to time, there arise, in art as in life, men of superior genius, of comprehensive knowledge, and of inflexible will, who prove themselves above their contemporaries, above their age, and above the fetters of what has hitherto been regarded as right and proper. These men are the reformers, the revolutionists of art. It is by them that we reckon and name the greater and the lesser phases of art—from their first germs to their prime and youthful vigour, perfection and predominance, and then again to their decay, ruin, and destruction—down to the present day.

Orlando Lassus, Hans Leo von Hassler, Sebastian Bach, Handel, Joseph Haydn, Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven, were such revolutionists, innovators, and self-creative holders of power in the domain of the sacred art of music. I am speaking only of the last three centuries—down to the death of Beethoven. With him, and Franz Schubert who followed him so shortly afterwards, musical history really ends. If it does not—in this case, it is even better to let the living rest than the dead.

What the future will bring forth—who knows? If roses—well, they will bloom at the proper time.

Between, and side by side with, the primitive and great masters, there sprang up a number of men also very important in their way. But for them was reserved a far different mission, and a much more modest lot. While the first came decidedly forward as creators, pioneers, and coryphei, it fell to the lot of the latter to be actively useful as the guardians and trustees of what had been received, handed down, and inherited. It was they whose duty it was to spread abroad the news of the golden treasure which the great masters had brought to light from out the abyss of darkness, the father telling it to the son and the master to the pupil, so that the glad tidings should not be lost, should not be forgotten in the low turmoil of every-day life.

But they were doomed to be forgotten themselves! The splendour of their name was immediately to pale and die away—while the names of their heroes, like Sirius and Orion, will for ever shine in the firmament of art.

Such has been their mission, their recompense, and—their curse!—and the pot must not murmur against the potter; the arrow, once shot, must not turn and find its way back to the heart of the skilful marksman.

In a lofty cathedral, or in a stupendous pyramid, there are, comparatively speaking, but few large square stones quarried for the magnificent columns, the artistic finials, and arches. It is these, however, which immediately strike the eye of everyone who gazes at the stately pile. It is these which, more than aught else, establish the fame of the wise architect. The great mass of stonework concealed in the walls and the interior of the edifice is known to, and appreciated by, no one—except the architect himself, and, perhaps, two or three experts. But these few know and acknowledge that the internal mass of stone, hidden from the eye of the passer-by, is as important to the existence of the whole of the large building, as all the proud arched buttresses, and all the work of pinnacles and finials, so delicate and tapering.

And this—simultaneously with the inevitable curse—is the reward and consolation of these men, who, though called, are not chosen—not chosen to stand above their own age as well as above every other.

And then, further, neither the stone, when it is raised out of the bosom of the earth, nor the man, when he first sees the light of the world, knows its, or his, destiny. And the stone is dumb and dead for ever—but hope immediately springs up in man, while he—lives entirely for it. And everyone—the last as well as the first in the vineyard—believes and hopes he shall be chosen for the highest aims. So he struggles, and dares, and toils, he grows neither fatigued nor wearied, he never gives in, but believes and hopes, and perseveres—goes on persevering as long as day lasts, and till night comes, when no one can work any longer. And, finally—even at the grave, he raises the standard of Hope!

He is right, for hope never leads him to disgrace. And if, after all, the restless workman's labour, his uninterrupted activity, his never-wearying hopes and perseverance, do not benefit him, do not increase the honour of his own name—they profit, at any rate, art, his salvation, his all—they increase, at any rate, the honour of Him who existed from the beginning, through whose word all that is was made—including art, and the love of art, and the belief in it, and the unfading hope in all the blessing and peace it contains.

The consciousness of our acts will and must console us. It has consoled hundreds and thousands—who at last acknowledged that the value of life is abnegation, and that death is man's only true friend, maturing and hoarding up, ad infinitum, the fruit which was not to ripen here.

In such a doubly mystic sense must we understand what the great Calderon says: "In this life all is truth and all is falsehood."

It is my purpose, in the following lines, to re-introduce to the reader some of these forgotten masters, some of these "musicians who have died away." Who knows whether patriotism, a feeling of reverence—or, at least—of curiosity, may not procure for my sketches some small degree of attention.—Quod Deus bene vertat!

Francis Joseph Leonti Meyer von Schauensee, Papal Pro-Notarius, Chaplain, and Organist at the noble Foundation of St. Leodegar, Lucerne, born the 10th August, 1720, shall be the first in the series.

The period of his musical exertions, as well as of his reputation as an excellent composer for the Church and the stage, lies between Sebastian Bach and Joseph Haydn, though he is not to be regarded as properly a precursor of the latter, since he leaned more to the Italians (having passed most of his youth and manhood in Italy), especially to Pergolese, without, however, degenerating into that composer's whining sentimentality. From this he was preserved by his vigorous Swiss nature. His model in the showy church-style, fashionable in the middle of that century, was Caldara—in dramatic composition, Jomelli. His orchestral productions—modelled, probably, after Hasse—were never very well known. Even in his own lifetime, they cannot have been exceedingly popular, seeing that only a few were engraved.

I now turn to the history of Meyer's life, following principally a Swiss monkish chronicle, printed in 1761, which, we are assured, "was compiled from several manuscripts, printed or otherwise," "D.G.O.B., Mus. Mag., of W.," being named as the author.

Meyer's father was Joseph Leonti, Lord of Schauensee, Councillor and Architect of Lucerne, a scholar, who, in addition to the other things he did, played the piano and composed. His wife, whose maiden name was Rusconi, played the lute, and was celebrated for her singing and painting. But it was the grandfather, Francis Joseph, also a famous lautist, who, as it turned out, really took upon himself to cultivate and develop the musical talent of his grandson and godchild.

As early as 1725 he took the lively boy, eagerly anxious for knowledge, into his own house. Out of school hours he instructed him in singing, lute-playing, geography, and the history of the Confederacy.

In 1726 the boy was sent to learn music under Jost William Müller, then much esteemed as an organist, "who, in truth, communicated profitably to the boy, then six years old, the principles from the small and great School of General Bass of the celebrated Herr Johann von Mattheson, of Hamburgh."

About the year 1729, Müller could already leave, without any misgiving, the great organ of St. Leodegar entirely in charge of his pupil, who subsequently became himself the organist of this magnificent instrument, and his master's successor.

In November, 1731, the boy proceeded, for the purpose of commencing the study of the humanities and languages, to the Abbey of St. John, belonging to the Prince Abbot of St. Gallen, "where he felt a desire to practice under the superintendence of his uncle, Herr Lorentz Rusconi, Capitulary, and then Archirist and Kuchelmeister at Fischingen, and a Benedictine of the Order in Thurgau, who was pretty well skilled in gallant pieces."—Young Meyer began, also, the violin and violoncello, under the guidance of Professor Hieronymus König, Capitulary of St. Gallen, who was then staying at St. John's.

Except a break of about three months, which Meyer passed at St. Gallen, he remained till 1735 at St. John's, pursuing very zealously his music simultaneously with his linguistic and philosophical studies. At the end of the school-year, he returned to Lucerne, where he began composing some very pretty pieces of music himself.

CARISSIMI'S JONAH.

However many and various the styles of what is now understood by music, it admits ultimately of classification into only two kinds—distinguished not merely, like these styles, by accidental and very obvious characteristics, but by essential and more occult ones, due to the very different first principles by which the workers in them have severally been governed, principles briefly summed up in the word "tonality." The kind of music produced under, and comformable to, the "old tonality," may be said, in general terms, to have come to an end with the sixteenth century; and its authors are commonly described as "the old masters," whose type and representative was Palestrina. That which we owe to the new may be said (always in the same "general terms") to date from about the middle of the eighteenth century, its composers forming the modern school, of which Mozart may be regarded as the earliest complete type. Between these, the only two quite distinct schools of music, comes of course another, of "transitionists"—practitioners whose works "bridge over" the great gulf which divides the old master from the new; and of these the most remarkable, as well from the circumstances under which he exercised them as from his genius and acquirements—for he was spared to exercise his calling as an artist and teacher for eighty years of the greatest changes music had hitherto known, or is likely ever again to know—was Giacomo Carissimi. Of this great and indefatigable musician his "cantatas" are the most numerous and important works, not a few of them being worthy, from their extent as from their plan, of the name "oratorio"—a kind of musical work which, though not the invention of Carissimi, owes more to him than to any other single musician; though, it hardly needs to be said, greater genius and learning have since his day been brought to bear on oratorio than on any other kind of music. Of Carissimi's oratorios contemporary musical practice knows next to nothing. With a single exception—a performance of his Jephtha some years since at St. Martin's Hall—no musician of the present generation can have had the opportunity of hearing one of them adequately performed; nor do we believe that, till the present moment, any one of them has ever been printed in the vernacular of Germany, France, or England, or in any way shaped so as to be intelligible to the average modern student. The recent publications of Dr. Chrysander—valuable as they are to the closet student, and suggestive, as they have no doubt been, of the addition before us and the performance we announce—are mere reprints. Mr. Leslie gave us not only a translation as literal and as Biblical as the exigencies of translation of words already set to music will allow, but an accompaniment the addition or creation of which demanded a hand reverential as well as skilful, and which put the realisation of the composer's intention within the reach of every performer or reader of fair skill and intelligence. The work contains seven choruses, two of them "double" and of considerable length. These are interspersed with recitative and aria parlante, through which the story is for the most part told, not by a single voice, as in more recent German oratorio, but by several voices of different quality and compass. The quasi-dramatic treatment, since so often adopted for oratorio, and the origin of which must be sought in the mysteries and liturgical dramas of the middle ages, allows of the utterance, in their own persons, both of Jonah and his seafaring companions; and the former on one occasion soliloquises in a strain which presents, mutatis mutandis, all the elements of the modern scena. The two double choruses—musically the most striking numbers of the work—are admirably contrasted in style; the one suggestive, stirring, and full of "effects," the other self-reliant, grandiose, and as it were unconscious. It is to be regretted that the construction of the book did not admit of their places being interchanged, since it is not impossible that the brilliancy of the first, "And there was a mighty tempest," may by comparison deaden the effect in the performance of everything that follows it. It would, however, be unreasonable to expect from a composer of the early part of the seventeenth century a skill in musical perspective by no means common at the close of the nineteenth; and if we would thoroughly understand and relish a work of art we must make our way to the stand-point occupied by the artist and his contemporaries. We heartily commend Jonah to the study, whether through the eye or ear, of every musical student desirous of forming a fair estimate of the art of his own time by the only means which will enable him to do so—comparison with that of an earlier, and, in this instance, singularly interesting, epoch.—J. H.

ORGAN NEWS.

The organ of Lancaster Parish Church has been re-opened after extensive alterations. G. P. England, the original builder, erected instruments in numerous churches, all of which appear to have earned for him a good name, and to have placed him in the rank of what is known now-a-days as the old builders; a position of no mean order when we recall to our mind such names as Renatus Harris, Father Smith, Byfield, the Jordans, Bridge, Snetzler, Avery, &c., &c. The cost of the organ in the "High Church" at Lancaster, as Hopkins and Dr. Rimbault have it in their History of the Organ, was £672, and the date 1809. This latter, however, does not tally with the brass plate which used to be in front of the keys, and on which was engraved: "G. P. England, Londini, fecit, 1811." In all probability, the last named date is correct. Various additions have been made to England's old work, the most important of which were by Holt of Leeds, about 20 years since, when was added a new pedal organ of three stops, consisting of a 16 feet open Bourdon and Trombone. Gray & Davidson also made some slight changes to the swell and choir organs, but of no great importance. Therefore we assume that (with the exception of the new pedal organ) the instrument has received no improvements of a material character from the year 1811 to the present time.

We here append a synopsis of the organ as enlarged by Hill & Sons; and may remark that the whole of England's pipes, as well as the greater portion of the action, &c., have been again used as far as practicable:—

The case is new, from a design by Messrs. Paley and Austin, the work done by Mr. Hatch. We ought to add that the organ was in a most unfinished state on the day of opening, so that it was impossible for Mr. Dean to display it to anything like advantage, but we hear that as soon as it is really complete, one or two recitals of sacred music will be given on it in order to afford the inhabitants of Lancaster an opportunity of judging of the various qualities of the instrument.

STEEL BARS VERSUS CHURCH BELLS.

The use of steel bars as a substitute for cast bells is very little known in England. They are introduced in the United States and Germany with great success, and would form a new branch of industry should the manufactory of them be taken up in this country. There is not only a large area for them in England, but a great demand may be expected from the flourishing colonies, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and India, as soon as they are known in those regions. The following outline will explain their particular merits combined with cheapness of production. Steel bars produce a very pure, distinct and particularly melodious sound with many other great advantages over church bells of moderate size. The power of a clear and sonorous sound can be obtained equally as well, if not superior, to that cast from bell metal or steel. Their weight will be very light in comparison with the present ponderous productions. They will not burden the steeple so much, and consequently will give more scope for architectural design, and have the merit of far sounding. Their winding and hanging up will not be so difficult, dangerous and expensive. They are not liable to crack, as is often the occurrence with bells, and are therefore adapted for use in any climate. The cost compared with manufactured cast bells is so trivial that small churches and chapels and especially mission stations abroad will be enabled to secure a peal. Three or four steel bars, forming a peal whose weight would not exceed 100lb., could be manufactured for £11 or £12, whereas only three cast bells of the same power would at least amount to £50 or £60. They can be made of any dimension, weight and power of sound. Every note or harmony can be produced more easily, and the tuning is obtained more precisely than in cast bells. In addition to their being a cheap and effective substitute for church bells, they are also equally applicable to places where large bells are required, such as dockyards, on board of vessels, steamboat piers, railways, lighthouses, manufactories. As I have devoted time and study to the subject I shall feel most happy to give my humble services and advice if I can forward the undertaking, and may add my belief that in a commercial point of view it will be found very remunerative.

AUGUSTUS CONRADI.*

This most popular of Berlin composers, an indefatigable musical illustrator of the local farces, a partner in the firms of Kalisch, Weihrauch, Pohl, Jacobson, etc., a humorous arranger of piquant popular medleys, and a composer of dance-music, succumbed on the 26th May, in his fifty-second year, to the grave malady which he had for years resisted with rare energy, and which interfered with his restless activity only a few weeks before his death. With him has disappeared another of the original figures peculiar to jovial old Berlin, figures which are now more rare in the capital, and which in future it may perhaps be useless to search for at all. He was the son of a police official, who, despite his narrow circumstances, gave the boy a good general education, and did all he could to develop his musical talent, which was displayed at a very early period. Augustus pursued his higher musical studies at the Royal Academy of Arts, Berlin, under A. W. Bach, Grell, and Rungenhagen, simultaneously with other hopeful pupils, among whom may be mentioned Lührs, Wichmann, and Rich. Wüerst. He became a thorough counterpuntist, and soon obtained a complete mastery over the strict forms of the quartet and the symphony. He was especially proficient in orchestration, so much so, indeed, that Franz Liszt sent for him to Weimar. Even while a pupil of the Academy, Conradi wrote short operas, which he produced at the then flourishing private theatres, the Thalia and the Concordia. One operetta of the period, Rübezahl, has been successfully performed at many public theatres, as, for instance, Kroll's and the Königsberg Theatre. A more important opera, Die Braut des Flussgottes, was produced at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, but with no very striking success. Conradi's principal efforts as a composer were made in the domain of farce. He provided with music far more, probably, than a hundred such pieces, which often owed their success principally to his collaboration. Work of this kind he executed with fabulous rapidity. No copyist would have transcribed one of his scores in the time Conradi took to jot down the original, His first appearance as a conductor was at the Vorstädtisches Theater, in Berlin; he then accepted an engagement as first Capellmeister at the Stettin Theatre. He occupied subsequently the same position at the old Königstadt Theatre, then in Dusseldorff and Cologne, and then at Kroll's, at Wallner's, and, lastly, at the Victoria, Berlin.

If Conradi did not do more as a Capellmeister, the fact is by no means attributable to adverse fate. On the contrary, he had several very excellent chances offered him of achieving a position more favourable to himself and better adapted to his talent. An unprincipled friend once secretly copied a symphony of his, and carried off with it the prize at a public competition in Vienna. The cheat being afterwards exposed, Conradi was invited to Vienna to reproduce his work, this time under his own direction. Not only was great honour shown him, but he had very advantageous offers from Vienna managers, as there was a far more grateful field for his talent in the Austrian capital than in Berlin. No less advantageous might have been his connection with Liszt. Whether he did not know how to profit by this, or whether, as Wenzel Müller was once attracted to the Josephstadt, he felt an irresistible hankering for the small theatres of Berlin, where he had to conduct for two hundred successive nights the music of the Actienbudiker and other similar "masterpieces" of dramatic poetry, for a rate of payment, too, that would not secure the services of a player at an evening party, or whether he did not feel at his ease in a higher position, is something that we cannot decide. Perhaps, possessing a correct appreciation of his own abilities, he preferred devoting himself to a branch of art which might be small but in which he was great. It is, however, unintelligible that, in his peculiarly good circumstances, he would not yield to the advice of his medical men, or the entreaties of his friends, and grant his shattered body repose and recreation. "He must provide for his old days," was the burden in reply to all such representations; he could not perceive that he would never see such "old days."—He died possessed of considerable property, partly inherited, and partly saved up. He bequeathed it for charitable purposes, but his widow enjoys the interest of it during her life. Who will benefit by the legacy, and whether the charities especially intended for musicians will derive advantage from it, are points not yet generally known.—H.

SIR,—Referring to the late calamitous fire, and to the losses which have been sustained by many persons connected with the Alexandra Palace, permit me to inform you that the directors of the Crystal Palace have already offered to set apart a day here for the benefit of the sufferers. This offer was yesterday conveyed by myself to the directors of the Alexandra Palace through their manager, whose reply we are now awaiting.—I remain, Sir your obedient servant,

J. WILKINSON,
Crystal Palace, June 12. Manager and General Superintendent.

WAIFS.

Mdlle. Sanz (contralto) and Signor Moriami (baritone) have both arrived from New York, accompanied by Mr. Healy, who has been a principal agent in the Maretzek-Jarrett tour in the United States. They crossed the Atlantic in the "City of London."

Cincinnati is so much pleased with its Festival that it announces another for 1875.

A machine for stereographing music as it is played on the piano is exhibited at Vienna.

Miss Rose Hersee arrived at Queenstown on Monday, from New York, by the Baltic steam-ship.

At Clinton (Iowa), lately, Mrs. Scott-Siddons was not allowed to give a reading in the church, "because the lady was formerly an actress on the stage."

Mr. Arthur Crook, organist of the Mayor's Chapel and of St. Andrew's, Montpelier, Bristol, has been appointed organist and choirmaster of Shelton Church, Stoke-on-Trent.

Miss Emma Barnett, the youngest sister of Mr. John Francis Barnett, the composer, made her début at the Royal Albert Hall on Monday, when the youthful pianist played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor (with orchestra), and played it so well that she was recalled to receive the well merited applause of her audience.

The exodus of professionals for Europe last Saturday was large. Among those who sailed were George Fawcett Rowe, Lydia Thompson, Camille Dudois, Samuel Colville, Mdlle. Carreno, Miss Anna Mehlig, Mdlle. Aimee, Sauret (the violinist), Mark Twain, J. M. Bellew, Signor Sparajani, and the Lami Family. George Macdonald, Antoinette Sterling, and Clara-Louise Kellogg sail shortly.—American Paper.

Mdlle. Laya, who is celebrated in Paris for her successful method of teaching singing, pianoforte playing, and other branches of musical education in classes, has commenced her "Reunions Musicales," for the London season, at her residence, 85, Sloane Street, Belgravia.

The Royal General Theatrical fund held their 28th anniversary at the Freemasons' Tavern on Thursday week, the Lord Mayor in the chair. During the evening there was a selection of operatic and ballad music, performed, under the direction of Herr Wilhelm Ganz, by Mdlle. Elena Corani and Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Enequist, Madame Pauline Rita, Miss Cullenford, and Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen; Mr. Trelawny Cobham and Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Selwyn Graham, Mr. Edward Murray, and Signor Caravoglia.

From Italy we learn that "a Bill for the abolition of Italian organ boys has finally come on for discussion in the House of Deputies." This is glorious news (for the Bill seems sure to pass), and we shall double our donations on Hospital Sunday. Albeit abolition is a strong measure, and we have never wished any bodily harm to the boys, and should have been glad if the organ nuisance could have been stopped without the annihilation of the unfortunate musicians. But we have suffered too much and too long to think of interfering with what, no doubt, is superior wisdom on the part of the Italian deputies—so the law must take its course.—Punch.

Herr Keler Béla will go to America on the following conditions:—He must find a manager in New York, or other large American city, in possession of sufficient means to render the engagement a certainty by depositing a certain sum of money with his banker, either at Berlin or Wiesbaden. He would then require to select from the musicians of New York an orchestra of from thirty-five or forty men, with a view of their being ultimately engaged by the manager, Béla himself to be engaged as their director for a whole season, and, according to the custom in vogue in America, all to be paid at the end of every week or after each concert. "Further," he says, "I should want a free pass to and from America, free living at hotels, and have my expenses paid in travelling in and between the various cities, &c. I should want to give my concerts in the Vienna-Strauss fashion, introducing pretty selections from Polish operas, waltzes, polkas, galops; also Hungarian music, &c., from various composers." This is an artistic modesty with a vengeance.

More than 5000 visitors presented themselves at the east and west entrances to the Alexandra Palace grounds on Wednesday, and a surprising number of carriages and equestrians drove through. A stringed band in the orchestra of the banqueting-hall performed from ten till six. The shell of the western gable was still considered unsafe, and the police were strict in keeping persons without the barrier which has been erected. Search for the remains of Jordan, the fireman, has led to no discovery; nor have the poor fellow's friends received any tidings of him. The Salvage Corps have rescued little or nothing of value from the ruins. The rhododendron show is a very fine collection of plants, and the tent was, during some parts of the day, quite crowded. The nature of the future building has not yet been considered; but efforts will be made to replace the burnt palace with a structure quite as beautiful, although there is no second dome in the three kingdoms to be procured, as the ill-fated dome which occasioned the fire was, ready at hand. The swings and other amusements in the western portion of the grounds were in full operation yesterday, and the refreshment hall was a scene of continual bustle and business.

Milan.—A performance has been given at the Teatro dal Verme in aid of the funds for the monument to be erected to Manzoni. It consisted of I Promessi Sposi, by Signor Ponchielli; a "Funereal Prelude," by Signor Bernardi; the chorus: "S'ode a destra uno Squillo di Tromba," from the Carmagnola, set to music by an anonymous composer; a "Marcia funebre," and an "Elegia funebre," both by Signor Ponchielli. The last piece was unanimously encored.—An operetta entitled Un Tramonto will shortly be performed at the Conservatory. It is written by Signor Coronaro, a promising young pupil of that institution.

Carlsruhe.—The last concert of the season given by the Cecilia Union went off extremely well. The programme consisted almost entirely of new compositions. One great feature in it was Beethoven's A major Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello, played by Professor Krüger, from Stuttgart, and Herr Lindner. The former gentleman afterwards gave, alone, a "Hungarian Rhapsody" by the Abbate Franz Liszt, while Herr Lindner performed two solos by Johann Sebastian Bach. Mdlle. Hedwig Kindermann was heard to great advantage in an air from Handel's Semele; likewise in airs by Mozart and Schumann. The various choral pieces by Mühring, Gade, Schubert, Heyse, and Vierling, were admirably sung by the members of the Union.

Florence.—A new ballet, Il Telegrafo Elettrico, by Signor Danesi, has been produced with moderate success at the Teatro Principe Umberto.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. # WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

MESSRS. DUFF & STEWART, 147, OXFORD STREET, have the pleasure to announce that they have entered into arrangements with Madame BALFE for the Publication of the late M. W. BALFE'S Grand Opera, now in active rehearsal at Her Majesty's Opera.

Drury Lane Theatre was the scene of the great triumphs of this talented Composer; and it was his last wish that this work should be first performed in the scene of these former successes. The Director has unqualified pleasure in being enabled to accede to this desire of a distinguished musician, whom any country would gladly claim as its own. This important event will doubtless give a special interest and eclat to the Season. Sir MICHAEL COSTA has kindly consented to superintend the production of this great work, which is a sufficient guarantee that it will be perfect in all its details. Madame CHRISTINE NILSSON will create the character of "Edith Plantagenet."

REPORTS ON DISEASES OF THE THROAT.

"OBSERVATIONS ON THE HUMAN VOICE."

BY MANUEL GARCIA, ESQ.

Communicated by DR. SHARPEY, *Sec. R. S.

The pages which follow are intended to describe some observations made on the interior of the larynx during the act of singing. The method which I have adopted is very simple. It consists in placing a little mirror, fixed on a long handle suitably bent, in the throat of the person experimented on against the soft palate and uvula. The party ought to turn himself towards the sun, so that the luminous rays falling on the little mirror may be reflected on the larynx. If the observer experiment on himself, he ought, by means of a second mirror, to receive the rays of the sun, and direct them on the mirror, which is placed against the uvula. We shall now add our own deductions from the observations which the image reflected by the mirror has afforded us.

OPENING OF THE GLOTTIS.

At the moment when the person draws a deep breath, the epiglottis being raised, we are able to see the following series of movements:—The arytenoid cartilages become separated by a very free lateral movement; the superior ligaments are placed against the ventricles; the inferior ligaments are also drawn back, though in a less degree, into the same cavities; and the glottis, large and wide open, is exhibited so as to show in part the rings of the trachea. But, unfortunately, however dexterous we may be in disposing these organs, and even when we are most successful, at least the third part of the anterior of the glottis remains concealed by the epiglottis.

MOVEMENT OF THE GLOTTIS.

As soon as we prepare to produce a sound, the arytenoid cartilages approach each other, and press together by their interior surfaces, and by the anterior apophyses, without leaving any space, or intercartilaginous glottis; sometimes even they come in contact so closely as to cross each other by the tubercles of Santorini. To this movement of the anterior apophyses that of the ligaments of the glottis corresponds, which detach themselves from the ventricles, come in contact with different degrees of energy, and show themselves at the bottom of the larynx under the form of an ellipse of a yellowish colour. The superior ligaments, together with the aryteno-epiglottidean folds, assist to form the tube which surmounts the glottis; and being the lower and free extremity of that tube, enframe the ellipse, the surface of which they enlarge or diminish according as they enter more or less into the ventricles. These last scarcely retain a trace of their opening. By anticipation, we might say of these cavities that, as will afterwards appear clearly enough in these pages, they only afford to the two pair of ligaments a space in which they may easily arrange themselves. When the aryteno-epiglottidean folds contract they lower the epiglottis, and make the superior orifice of the larynx considerably narrower.

The meeting of the lips of the glottis, naturally proceeding from the front towards the back, if this movement is well managed, it will allow, between the apophyses, of the formation of a triangular space or intercartilaginous glottis, but one which, however, is closed as soon as the sounds are produced.

After some essays, we perceive that this internal disposition of the larynx is only visible when the epiglottis remains raised. But neither all the registers of the voice, nor all the degrees of intensity, are equally fitted for its taking this position. We soon discover that the brilliant and powerful sounds of the chest-register contract the cavity of the larynx, and close still more its orifice; and, on the contrary, that veiled notes, and notes of moderate power, open both so as to render any observation easy. The falsetto register especially possesses this prerogative, as well as the first notes of the head-voice.* So as to render these facts more precise, we will study in the voice of the tenor the ascending progression of the chest-register, and in the soprano that of the falsetto and head-registers.

EMISSION OF THE CHEST-VOICE.

If we emit veiled and feeble sounds, the larynx opens at the notes do, 2 re, 2 mi, 2  †; and we see the glottis agitated by large and loose vibrations throughout its entire extent. Its lips comprehend in their length the anterior apophyses of the arytenoid cartilages and the vocal cords; but, I repeat it, there remains no triangular space.

As the sounds ascend the apophyses, which are slightly rounded on their internal side by a gradual apposition commencing at the back, encroach on the length of the glottis; and as soon as we reach the sounds si, 3 do, 3  , they finish by touching each other throughout their whole extent; but their summits are only solidly fixed one against the other at the notes do♯, 3 ré, 3  . In some organs these summits are a little vacillating when they form the posterior end of the glottis, and the two or three half-tones which are formed show a certain want of purity and strength, which is very well known to singers. From the do♯, 3 ré, 3  the vibrations, having become rounder and purer, are accomplished by the vocal ligaments alone, up to the end of the register.

The glottis at this moment presents the aspect of a line slightly swelled towards its middle, the length of which diminishes still more as the voice ascends. We also see that the cavity of the larynx has become very small, and that the superior ligaments have contracted the extent of the ellipse to less than one half.

When instead of veiled and feeble sounds we make use of full and vibrating ones, the glottis becomes visible only at the sounds mi, 3 fa, 3  , and those above them, a limit which depends to a certain extent on the dexterity of the singer. For all the rest the organs act as we have just said, but with a double difference: 1. The cavity of the larynx contracts itself more when the voice is intense than when it is feeble; 2. The superior ligaments are contracted so as to reduce the small diameter of the ellipse to a width of two or three lines. But, however powerful these contractions may be, neither the cartilages of Wrisberg, nor the superior ligaments themselves, ever close sufficiently to prevent the passage of the air, or even to render it difficult. This fact, which is verified also with regard to the falsetto and head-registers, suffices to prove that the superior ligaments do not fill a generative part in the formation of the voice. We may draw the same conclusion by considering the position occupied by the somewhat feeble muscles which correspond to these ligaments; they cover externally the extremity of the diverging fibres of the thyro-arytenoid muscles, and take part especially in the contractions of the cavity of the larynx during the formation of the high notes of the chest and of the head-registers.

* From the "Proceedings of the Royal Society of London," Vol. VII., 1856, Meeting of May 24, 1855. Page 399 to 410.

* Let us here observe that three registers of voice are generally admitted,—chest, falsetto and head. The first begins lower in a man's voice than in a woman's; the second extends equally in both voices; the third reaches higher in the female voice.

† The musical limits we establish in the course of these pages vary a little in each individual.

PRODUCTION OF THE FALSETTO.

The low notes of the falsetto, show the glottis infinitely better than the unisons of the chest-voice, and produce vibrations more extended and more distinct. Its vibrating sides, formed by the anterior apophyses of the arytenoid cartilages and by the ligaments, become gradually shorter as the voice ascends; at the notes

, the apophyses take part only at their summits; and in these notes there results a weakness similar to that which we have remarked in the chest-notes an octave below. At the notes
, the ligaments alone continue to act; then begins the series of notes called head-voice. The moment in which the action of the apophyses ceases exhibits in the female voice a very sensible difference at once to the ear and in the organ itself. Lastly, we verify that, up to the highest sounds of the register, the glottis continues to diminish in length and in width.

If we compare the two registers in these movements, we shall find some analogies in them: the sides of the glottis, formed at first by the apophyses and the ligaments, become shorter by degrees, and end by consisting only of the ligaments. The chest-register is divided into two parts, corresponding to these two states of the glottis. The register of falsetto-head presents a complete similarity, and in a still more striking manner.

On other points, on the contrary, these same registers are very unlike. The length of the glottis necessary to form a falsetto note always exceeds that which produces the unison of the chest. The movements which agitate the sides of the glottis are also augmented, and keep the vibrating orifice continually half-opened, which naturally produces a great waste of air. A last trait of difference is in the increased extent of that elliptic surface.

All these circumstances, which we shall refer to again, show in the mechanism of the falsetto a state of relaxation, which we do not find in the same degree in the chest-register.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The season has begun! The concerts which take place from June 15 to July 15 (four times a week) open the season here. They are conducted by M. Clement, who also has the direction of the Theatre, and, with an efficient band of about thirty performers (all string and reed instruments), delights his audience from 4 to 5 p.m. M. Clement is most judicious in the selection of his programme, which he arranges to suit all tastes. The programme generally consists of two overtures, a fantasia, a valse, and "something" as a pièce de resistance, such as a "Rêverie" by Schumann, an "Andante Symphonique," or, as to-day, a little gem entitled "Entr'acte de Mignon" (the introduction to the second act of Ambroise Thomas's opera), which, being generally played after the curtain is up, is last. The programmes hitherto have only brought before us old favourites, such as the overtures to Zampa and the Cheval de Bronze, and a Fantasie sur la Fille du Regiment, &c., all well conducted and performed under the auspices of M. Clement Martin himself.

The opera season commences on July 1 with Faust. With the exception of the orchestra and chorus, and last year's tenor (M. Bresson), we are to have an entirely new company of artists.

Next week I hope to be able to forward the names of our next opera troupe, and more details of our concerts at the Etablissement, which are really "hors ligne." We are all sanguine about the success of La Fille de Mdme. Angot, which, there is no doubt, will be given during the season. S. C.

June 18th, 1873.

SEVILLE.—Dinorah proved a great success with Signora Volpini, Signori Verger and Palermi. The same holds good of Les Huguenots, with Mdme. Sass, Signori Ugolini and David.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

A scheme is on foot for the members of the National Theatre, Pesth, to give, during their summer recess, a number of performances here, for the purpose of introducing Hungarian opera to the visitors at the Grand International Exhibition. The theatre selected is the Theater an der Wien, while the operas are to be Hunyady Laszlo; Bankban; Dozsa Oyörgy, Zrinyi; and Bran kovits.

The inaugural concert of the first European Ladies'-Orchestra came off, a short time since, in the large room of the Musical Union. The favourable impression produced by the appearance of so many fair musicians, nearly all in the very flower of their age, was forcibly backed up by their performance. Madame Joseph Amann-Weinlich proved herself a talented and energetic conduct-ress. Three of the youthful members distinguished themselves as soloists. The first violin, Mdlle. Pauline Jewe, was recalled three times, and overwhelmed with applause. The violoncellists, Mdlle. Louise Dallmeyer (Nocturne by Chopin), and Mdlle. Elise Weinlich (Capriccio by Gottermann), were likewise highly successful, each being recalled twice.

Two very fine hymns to the Virgin, "Ave, Maris Stella," and "Virgo amabilis," the former for soprano solo, the latter for contralto solo, have been sung at the Dominican Church by Mdlle. Ludmilla Adélsberg and Mdlle. Hermine Wodat, both pupils of Mdlle Caroline Pruckner, Herr Cyrill Wolf presiding at the organ, and Herr Hellmesberger taking the violin part. These hymns are by Dr. Hermann Zopff.

An old piano, a regular tin-kettle sort of thing, with a shabby, worn top, and shaky legs, has been placed in a pavilion behind the east wing of the Great Exhibition building. The old instrument is a most interesting and valuable relic. It belonged to Franz Schubert, who composed on it all those beautiful melodies which have delighted millions, made the fortune of his publishers, and brought him in, individually, so much that—he died a beggar! Poor Schubert!

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Mr. Henry Leslie has organized a series of three grand concerts, the first of which was given on Saturday afternoon. To these Mr. Leslie attaches the title of "London Musical Festival," although the programmes scarcely, perhaps, justify so high-sounding a denomination. The means of execution, however, are such as the vast dimensions of Albert Hall imperatively require; and that they are not only powerful but efficient was shown by the general performance of the Messiah. With an instrumental band of one hundred professional musicians, and a chorus of some eight hundred singers, all more or less accustomed to the masterpiece of Handel, the best results were looked for; and it must be admitted that there was little or no cause for anything but satisfaction. Mr. Henry Leslie himself conducted, and Mr. J. C. Ward "presided" at the organ.

The hall was crowded in every part, and the audience, though not over-demonstrative, were evidently impressed with the oratorio from first to last. Most of the choruses were delivered with great precision and effect, although some were taken rather faster than is usually the case. Among the most striking were "And the glory of the Lord," and "For unto us a Child is born"—Isaiah's prophecy of the Saviour—which last was much applauded. About the incomparable "Hallelujah," and the not less admirable "Worthy is the Lamb," with its immortal peroration, "Amen," it would be superfluous to speak. Enough that the "eight hundred" choristers did their duty well—so well, indeed, as to reflect credit alike upon themselves and their conductor. The solo parts could hardly have been intrusted to artists more able to render them justice. The chief soprano was Madame Christine Nilsson; the second soprano, Mdlle. Marie Roze; the contralto was Madame Trebelli-Bettini; the tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves; and the bass, Signor Agnesi (of Her Majesty's Opera). A stronger "cast," if we may be allowed the expression, could hardly be imagined. We need not enter into a detailed account of how all the well-known airs were given. Happily, both the solos and choruses of the Messiah, for years out of mind, in this country where the oratorio was composed, have been familiar as "household words." With the artists above-named it may easily be understood that the solos were uniformly well rendered. Madame Christine Nilsson, of whose singing in oratorio we have often spoken, has, perhaps, rarely shown to more advantage than on the present occasion. In 'Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion," and "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace," she was much and deservedly applauded; but her greatest success was in the fervently devotional air, "I know that my redeemer liveth," to which she imparted a sentiment peculiarly her own—a sentiment which so much touched the audience that they insisted on a repetition. Madame Trebelli-Bettini was very successful in "But who may abide," and still more so in "He shall feed his flock," the second verse of which, "Come unto Him," in accordance to traditional habit, was allotted to another singer. That other singer was Mdlle. Marie Roze, a worthy associate of the renowned contralto, whose subsequent reading of "He was despised" was irreproachable. How Mr. Sims Reeves interprets the tenor music of the Messiah, from "Comfort ye My people" and "Every valley shall be exalted" to the great declamatory air, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," all our readers know. In the Passion music, from "All they that see Him laugh Him to scorn" to the consoling climax, "Thou didst not leave his soul in hell," this greatest of English singers was never surpassed. His delivery of the recitative, "He that dwelleth in Heaven," and the air, "Thou shalt break them," its magnificent sequel, made an impression only to be created by the highest display of art. The air was encored and repeated. In the absence of Mr. Santley, we doubt if any singer, especially a foreigner, could now do more justice to the bass music in the Messiah than Signor Agnesi (a Frenchman, be it understood). In "The people that walked in darkness" and "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?"—two pieces as dissimilar as any two pieces can be—Signor Agnesi showed intelligent sympathy with the music; and this was further proved in "The trumpet shall sound," accompanied by Mr. T. Harper as no other than Mr. Harper now has the skill to accompany it. The final chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb," was a splendid conclusion to a really admirable performance.

For the second concert of the "London Musical Festival" (Wednesday) Mr. Leslie prepared a selection of music exclusively secular and chiefly operatic; for the third (to-day), we are promised Rossini's Stabat Mater, and a series of sacred pieces, from Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mendelssohn, &c., terminating with the "National Anthem," solos by Madame Christine Nilsson. It must be admitted that this is a strange kind of "London Musical Festival." Mr. Gye might with equal reason style his Saturday Concerts in Floral Hall "Covent Garden Musical Festival." That few have striven more earnestly for the cause of sterling music than Mr. Henry Leslie is undeniable; but the term "Festival" ought to signify something out of the common order. How often we in London hear the Messiah and the Stabat Mater at Exeter Hall and elsewhere need not be told. Why, then, "Festival," simply because they are presented at Albert Hall? Is it on account of the profits being devoted to charitable purposes?

GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

(From the "Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter.")

A Berlin correspondent of the Daily Telegraph has written a very bold impeachment of the musical character of the Germans. He undertakes to prove that they are not the musical nation we suppose, and his chief, if not his only argument is, that the executants at the Berlin concerts are not equal to those who hold the highest position in England. His latter statement may be true, though the extravagant style of his writing does not invite our confidence. What we object to is that he treats a handful of executants as the be-all and end-all of the musicality of a country. This is the universal habit of professional musicians. Mr. Henry Leslie, for example, read a paper on "Music in England" at the Royal Institution not long since. His only idea of music in England appeared to be concerts of the highest class, and his only hope for the future of the art in our country was that Government would liberally endow a National Academy for training executants. Another instructive example of the same habit has recently occurred. Mr. Henry Lunn, in the current number of the Musical Times, supposes himself to see in a vision the musical customs of the year 1973. One would naturally expect that he would look first for signs of the spread of music and the elevation of musical taste among the people in general. Are the working class singers and players? Have they been brought under the refining influence of the art? Are good musical performances to be heard in every town, and have they driven out the present partiality for noise and rhythm? Such are the questions which, as affecting the happiness of the greatest number, a musician gifted with such a vision as Mr. Lunn's might be expected to ask himself. But we find that his observations are directed to such trivial matters as the royalty system, the treatment of musicians at musical parties, &c. In this Mr. Lunn merely follows the prevailing custom of which we have spoken.

But a nation is not made musical by a dozen pre-eminent artists; and it does not follow that it is unmusical because its performers, compared with those of another country, must take second rank. Without offence to the Arabella Goddards, the Lemmens-Sherringtons, the Sims Reeves, and the Santleys, who have proved that the English can produce musicians of the first rank—it may be said that great artists are cosmopolitan. They pass freely from one country to another, and naturally stay wherever their talent meets the highest reward. If it is true that England has better concerts than Germany, the reason is, not that we are more musical, but that we are a far richer nation, and draw to ourselves the talent of the world. We shall continue to enjoy the pre-eminence which so delights the Telegraph correspondent, as long as we keep our riches: the Americans are already beginning to prove to us that we must be prepared some day to yield the palm. The musicality of a country depends not on the magnitude of a few stars, but on the level of musical capacity among the people in general; on the extent to which society is permeated with musical enjoyments; on the average musical taste which the people possess. The musicality of a country is more likely to be gauged in the Home than in the metropolitan concert-room or opera-house. Even if the Berliners cannot command the resources of Costa and Hallé, it is still possible that Germany is a more musical nation than England.

That this is the fact every impartial observer must testify. Take in the first place the bands. We remember reading in an old musical magazine the remark that though one may find no band in Germany equal to that of the Philharmonic Society, fifty may be found only inferior to it; and this well expresses the state of things in that country. It is the universal custom of the Germans to spend the evenings of their long summer in public gardens, of which every city, town, and village is possessed. They would as soon think of doing without seats in these gardens as without music, and so every village has its band, with daily performances. The quality of these bands is excellent. We never yet heard one, in the remotest country place which it was not a pleasure to listen to. They always contain stringed instruments. The "brass band"—that terror to musical ears in England—is unknown in Germany, for the military bands contain so large an admixture of reeds that their effect is almost as soft as that of an orchestra. The rhythmical grace, the unity of effect, and the precision of attack which these bandsmen obtain is a natural consequence of playing together month after month, and often year after year. We have never heard anything to equal it in England. In this country, on the contrary, we have only a few regularly formed bands, most of the work being done by scratch companies. As for the village and open air fetes amongst us, witness the combinations of concertina and harp, violin and flute, &c., which make day hideous. The German band, as we call it, is an institution peculiar to England. We can only explain the visits of these melancholy Teutons to our shores by supposing that they come to us, like some Scotch Presbyterian ministers, because they can get no "call" in their native land.

All who have heard the home music of Germany must have been struck by its superiority to our own. The ladies sing much better, and if they do not strike terror into the piano by their Variations, they play Beethoven and Schumann with quiet taste and deep feeling. A part-song is possible at an evening party, and it is sure to be followed by good violin playing. The extent of the music trade in Germany is a further proof of the degree of musical capacity which the people possess. A day at Leipsic is enough to prove this to any one. Where have we in England a music-house like that of Breitkopf and Hartel, in size equal to a Manchester cotton mill, and dealing exclusively in classical music? Yet music-publishing is not confined in Germany, as it is in England, to one town. There are many centres, greater or less, of publication.

How are we to emulate this high state of general musical culture? In musical instincts the English are without doubt equal to any other nation. From peer to peasant they are passionately fond of music. The every-day experience of all of us proves this. Even the most degraded class in our large towns, whose spirit the efforts of the churches, of philanthrophy and of almsgiving, fail to touch, can be gathered together to listen to a concert, and to follow the music with eager faces and unfeigned delight. The truest judgment that has been passed on our musical character is by Mr. Disraeli in Lothair. "We may be a musical nation," he says, "but our taste would seem to require some improvement." The material is excellent; it is culture that is wanted. The spread of musical knowledge among the people at large is what we require; and this may go on even if other nations should outstrip us in their bidding for great artists. After all, this is the surest way to create performers and composers, and to raise their quality. For the general spread of musical knowledge would discover many persons of the highest natural endowments who are now "born to blush unseen;" and the demand for music would at once produce a school of composers, who, of all men, can never flourish in uncongenial soil.

[Very much query to the greater part of this.—A.S.S.]

NOVELTIES.

The English public are unquestionably careless about musical novelties—a fact due more to the national distaste for strange things than to any fault in their artistic conformation. They love old faces and are shy of new ones in the same degree as they love familiar tunes and have small curiosity about others. But public indifference cannot repress the "noble rage" of our composers, nor change the resolution of those pioneers of progress whose duty it is to head the advance-guard of art. If an illustration of this be needed, we have only to point out the fact that the present year will witness the production of more new works than, perhaps, any year within the last half-century. The novelties in question, moreover, are not trifles, but serious things, intended by their composers to occupy a position in the highest walks of art. We look upon the phenomenon with unalloyed pleasure, as indicating the existence of real progress in the midst of a good deal that seems disheartening, and in spite of the croaking of those pessimists whom music seems to breed as a swamp breeds frogs.

A novelty was produced on Tuesday week—first of the procession of its kind. True, it was but a pièce d'occasion, which, from its very nature, cannot have more than a transitory interest. True, also, that it deals with a subject in respect of which the British public have had enough. The late Prince Consort may have been the paragon of perfection he was so loudly proclaimed to be—after his death; but that supplies no reason why admiration should develop into worship, and make a god of a well-meaning German prince. Apart from these considerations, which have nothing to do with Signor Arditi's music, the Ode to the Memory of the Prince Consort, performed on the twentieth birthday of the Crystal Palace, deserves attention as the serious work of a composer whose place in English musical society is due to hard work and unquestionable skill. The verses of the Ode are from the pen of Mr. Willert Beale (Walter Maynard), whose experience could safely be trusted to make them fit for musical treatment, and the general plan of the work is commendable. First of all comes a choral "Invitation" to the angels to join in songs of praise to God; the angels responding by a prayer, that the Highest will accord His "bounteous grace" to those mortals who seek to honour the memory of a faithful servant. The "Angel of Peace" then, in glowing strains, describes

> "The land
> Where the thistle and the rose
> With the shamrock grow entwined,
> And their fairest tints disclose."

laying stress upon the fact that—

> "Princely wisdom in that land

To the "Angel of Peace" succeeds his traditional companion, the "Angel of Plenty," with an appropriate discourse, after which the two Celestials magnify their beneficent mission to the abodes of men:—

> "Ever silent and unseen
> We our Master's will obey,
> And protect the true and just
> In their dwellings night and day."

Then the mortals take up the strain with a chorus laudatory of "a name not made by battles won," but "by a guiding power of mind bent to the service of mankind." A prayer follows in which the mortals ask that their thoughts of the Prince Consort may be sanctified, and that they may be brought to the place where "he lives again, free from all mortal care and pain." Next comes a chorus of thanksgiving, and a prayer for the Queen, the whole concluding with the ascription:—

> "Laudate Dominum de coelis, > Laudate eum in excelsis."

Signor Arditi, wisely consulting the bent of his own talent, and the character of the school in which he was trained, has written throughout with freedom of style and a lavish use of recognised aids to popular effect. We are bound to say that he has succeeded in producing a work adapted for its special purpose, and that the cheers which congratulated him at the close of the performance on Tuesday were a legitimate reward. At the same time we do not approve every portion of the music. The square cut phrases of the Invocation have a formal effect, for example, and there is, in the succeeding chorus, too much employment of conventional passages. But as the work progresses Signor Arditi appears to gather confidence. There are some happy effects in the concluding part of the Angels' prayer, and both the solos, as well as the duet, are attractive pieces, written with fluency and skill. The subsequent choruses are broadly conceived, and worked out with much massiveness of style; the concluding double chorus being a fitting and appropriate end to a work which here reaches its climax. We trust that it will not be long before Signor Arditi is found again occupying the post of chef d'orchestre in which he gave so many proofs of special skill; but, meanwhile, his time is profitably employed.

Three new works are in preparation for the Birmingham Festival, the largest being Mr. Sullivan's oratorio, The Light of the World. So able and ambitious a composer will not neglect the splendid chance now offered him of achieving a chef d'œuvre. To use a popular expression, the ball lies under his foot, and he may do with it all that his strength permits. That Mr. Sullivan can do much need not be said, nor need it be pointed out that his ultimate reputation and place among creative musicians depend largely upon what he may now accomplish. He knows this perfectly well, and we are entitled to assume that The Light of the World will engage his utmost powers. The libretto is understood to be the work of Mr. George Grove, whose strong poetic feeling it, no doubt, illustrates, especially as the words come from the Bible, that exhaustless reservoir of the truest poetry. How the subject is treated we are not able to tell, but the title is enough to indicate that Mr. Sullivan has chosen a theme of high sacred interest, and one that makes no ordinary demand upon no ordinary powers.

The second Birmingham novelty is Signor Randegger's cantata, Fridolin. We understand that the subject has been taken by Madame Rudersdorff from Schiller's Message to the Forge—a vigorous poem of which some of our readers may know the late Lord Lytton's translation beginning:—

> "A harmless lad was Fridolin,
> A pious youth was he;
> He served and sought her grace to win,
> Count Savern's fair ladye.
> And gentle was the Dame as fair,
> And light the toils of service there,
> And yet the woman's wildest whim,
> For her, had been but joy to him."

Those who know the story know, also, how fit it is for musical treatment in the dramatic style, and we shall be greatly surprised if a consensus of opinion do not prove that Madame Rudersdorff has treated it with admirable judgment and knowledge of effect. Signor Randegger may be trusted to win success in an effort quite congenial to his tastes, and there is good reason to believe that his music, rendered by the superb means available at Birmingham, will make a deep impression.

Signor Schira's Lord of Burleigh—an adaptation, or paraphase, of the Laureate's well-known poem—is the third of the novelties to be produced in the capital of the so-called Black Country. The music is, we believe, finished and in the hands of its chosen interpreters. Moreover, the choruses have been once rehearsed by the Festival choir with a result which, according to the Birmingham Daily Post, gave much satisfaction. This was to be expected, because Signor Schira is a musician who long ago won the spurs of artistic knighthood.

Turning from Birmingham to Hereford, we find Sir Gore Ouseley, the Oxford Professor of Music, ready with a new oratorio, Hagar. Sir Gore is the Precentor of Hereford Cathedral, and has, therefore, a certain claim upon the local Festival; but he is also a man of mark in the profession, and a composer whose church music, to say nothing of his oratorio, Polycarp, his compositions for the organ, and theatrical treatises, has made his name widely known. By all means, then, a respectful hearing is due to Hagar, when the time comes for the sorrows of Abraham's discarded mistress to find musical expression.

From Hereford we go to the more western city of Bristol, where, at the Festival conducted by Mr. Hallé, a new oratorio, John the Baptist, by the most learned of English musicians, Mr. G. A. Macfarren, awaits a hearing. The overture to this work, amateurs will remember, was produced at a Philharmonic concert some time ago, and made an impression due to its strong suggestiveness, vivid colouring, and remarkable skill. If the oratorio prove worthy of its prelude, then in John the Baptist will be found an example of English music destined to take high rank among things of the kind.

Glasgow will be the last provincial town to hold a Festival, but, like the rest, has its novelty in preparation. We refer to the sacred cantata, Jacob, by Mr. Henry Smart, a composer who ought never to have any difficulty in obtaining a hearing for his music. The big Scottish city honours itself in honouring so capital a musician, and every English amateur will rejoice to find the festival directors justified by the result in giving up a portion of their scheme to Mr. Smart's latest work.

Here the list of novelties for 1873 ends. Is is not a goodly list?

LEIPSIC.—On Herr R. Wagner's sixtieth birthday, which fell on the 22nd May, a commemorative tablet in honour of the event was affixed to the house, No, 88, Brühl, in which he was born. The tablet, subscribed for by his friends and admirers here, is of white marble, fastened by means of four black marble clasps with bronze heads. It bears the inscription, partly in black capitals with red initials, and partly in gold capitals shaded black: "In diesem Hause ward geboren Richard Wagner, am 22 Mai, 1813" ("In this House was born Richard Wagner, the 22nd May, 1813)."

THE ALEXANDRA PALACE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Having heard that, in the notice of the lamentable fire at the Alexandra Palace yesterday, it was stated that all our pianofortes were destroyed, we have much pleasure in announcing that several gentlemen were successful in rescuing six of our instruments, and beg that you will allow us, through the medium of you valuable columns, to take this opportunity of thanking them for their great assistance.—We are, Sir, yours very truly, CHARLES VENABLES & Co.

SARDOU AND DUMAS.

"Spiridion," in a late letter from Paris to the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, gives the following interesting particulars of the early struggles of two dramatists whose fame is now world-wide: There is nothing more encouraging than the history of the early struggles of eminent men. First successes are commonly easy only to mediocrity. Swift was far advanced in life before he was able to make himself known. Lord Mansfield had determined to retire from the bar, when the eve of the day on which he was to execute his resolution brought him his first client and an income of $15,000 a year. Thackerary was thirty-seven before he had risen out of obscurity. Curious were the horoscopes cast for Mons. Victorien Sardou and the younger Dumas. The former's first piece, La Taverne des Etudiants, was a drama in verse. The Odéon brought it out. 'Twas, with enthusiasm, hissed off the stage. Sardou was then very poor, fasting oftener than he feasted, living in a garret, without a soul to cheer him; even his father and mother had turned their backs on him. He was guilty of a crime which could not be forgiven—he had taken to ink. He wrote another piece, a comedy, Candide, drawn from Voltaire's story. It sparkled with wit and imagination. Mdlle. Dejazet had taken deep interest in Sardou; although she was old enough to be his great-grandmother, the malicious say her heart was engaged. Certain it is she determined to bring Sardou out as a dramatic author. About this time she received a letter from Mons. Cogniard, then manager of the Varieties Theatre. He offered her an engagement. She went to see Mons. Cogniard, and this conversation ensued: "You wish to engage me?" "I do." "What terms do you offer?" "$400 a month, and a per noctem every night you appear." "They are fair." "Do you accept them?" "Yes, upon one condition: you will pay no per noctem, but instead thereof you will play a piece I have in my possession." "The deuce!—and I'll bet the piece is a new one." "It is." "And by a new author?" "You have guessed right." Mons. Cogniard sighed deeply, and said, "Well, well! Let me see the piece. By whom is it? I will give you an answer in a few days." A week afterwards, Mdlle. Dejazet received this note, and the manuscript play: "My dear Dejazet,—I return herewith the manuscript; its author will never succeed as a playwriter; you may tell him so from me. Believe me to be wholly yours, Cogniard." Mdlle. Dejazet refused to accept the engagement. She opened a theatre for herself. She brought out—not Candide, which, by the way, has never been played—but Le Pré de St. Gervais, and when the curtain fell on the last scene of the last act, Victorien Sardou was famous.

In 1860, a young man and an elderly gentleman were one day walking the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle, and engaged in earnest discussion. The elderly gentleman said to his companion: "I assure you, my dear Alexandre, that you are wrong not to confine your talents to novel writing. Your Aventures de Quatre Femmes et d'un Perroquet is very amusing; Antonine is very touching; La Dame aux Camelias is extremely dramatic"—"And 'tis from that Dame aux Camelias itself—which you confess to be dramatic—that I have drawn my play." "Ah! your comedy is La Dame aux Camelias?" "Yes, and now I must leave you, for I have an appointment with the manager of the Gymnase. He is to return me an answer to the application I have made to play my piece." Young Alex. Dumas entered the manager's office. He found there not only the manager, but a girl of seventeen, extremely beautiful, with chesnut hair and fascinating manners. The manager said to him: "Take a seat, my dear fellow, and let us talk. I have read your piece, and—you want me to talk frankly to you?" "Certainly." "But I may give you pain." "Never mind." "Well, my dear fellow, I must tell you that you will never be a dramatic author. The stuff is not in you. You lack warmth, life, motion, which are essential to the dramatist." "So you refuse my piece?" "Yes, I refuse La Dame aux Camelias, and by refusing it I do you a service. Were I to bring it out, you would see a failure rare in its completeness. Do you see that young girl? Now I have just done her the same service I do you. She thinks she has talents for the stage, and wishes me to engage her. I refuse, and I have just told her that if she will believe me she will give up all thought of becoming an actress." You know the history of La Dame aux Camelias and of its author. That young girl was Mdlle. Aimée Désclée!

A RUSTIC'S OUTPOURING.

DEAR MR. "WORLD."—My business keeping me in your noisy London still, where, you may be sure, I miss the "serenity of Briary Brambles," I thought I'd go to your swell concert rooms in Hanover Square yesterday afternoon (afternoons are called mornings in London), to hear those very clever lads, Charles and Arthur Le Jeune, and their patent, Mr. C. W. Le Jeune, play upon their orchestral combination instruments. I was induced to give myself this little bit of pleasure from frequently reading in your Musical World what we, in our locality, call glowing accounts of these young gentlemen, especially with respect to the way in which they handle (I think that's the proper expression) and pedal the organ. Well, Sir, pleasure I found; so you may be sure I didn't regret going to their "Recital," which was the second of a series of three they had announced for this season. Arthur, the taller of the two boys, opened the bal with a very able performance upon the organ of Mendelssohn's charming Sonata in D. The instrument, though by no means powerful, is of an agreeable quality, some of the "stops" being very pleasing to me who am accustomed to pastoral sounds. Arthur also played, this time on the pianoforte, a solo of his own composition, "L'essor de l'imagination," and both the piece and the rendering won the smiles of the ladies present and the rustling of their fans. The other lad—I call him Charlie, for he is a nice little "chap;" we should think a deal of him down at the Brambles—made his first bow for an air with variations of his own, which he fluently rendered on the pianoforte. His second display was an organ solo, an offertoire. The composition and its "rendition," as the Yankees say, tell that he has been in admirable training. I should say he'll soon stand well in the "ring" among the "light-weights." We were favoured with three specimens upon the instruments I was desirous of hearing; and although Weber's name was affixed to one, and Auber's to another, I found very considerable interest in listening to the other specimen, which, called "La Néréide," was the composition of Charles Le Jeune. Perhaps the great charm of the performances upon the "Orchestral Combinations" (which instruments are second and third cousins, once or twice removed, of that asthmatical old chap we have in our village church, and which is called the harmonium) is the perfect result obtained through constantly playing together, or as they term it in our "Metropolitan Society," through plenty of "Reheersal." This was especially apparent in their playing of Auber's pretty overture, Zanetta.

I am afraid I have not left myself room to speak of the vocal music, which was sustained by Miss Catherine Swinhoe and Mr. Frederick Penna. The first I had not heard before, but I hope I shall hear her again. With a rich and fresh soprano voice, she sings like a musician, and, moreover, speaks her words distinctly. Mr. Frederick Penna, I remember, gave, a few years ago, a very interesting lecture at the Pavilion at Brighton on the great oratorio composers, Handel, Haydn, Spohr, and Mendelssohn. Being at that fashionable watering-place at the time, I went to hear him, and was particularly struck by the manner in which he sang the bass aria, "O, what is man?" from Spohr's Fall of Babylon. The song he sang yesterday, by Schubert, (whose stringed-quartet, which contains the lovely air with variations—you must know it well—they play at our "Melophonic Society"), was far too much for a general audience. However, he seemed to render it with the right expression. Far more effective, though very different as a composition, was the English Duet, which he and Miss Catherine Swinhoe sang, "The Syren and the Friar." When I say that the accompanying of the vocal music was in the hands of Mr. Charles E. Stephens, a gentleman whose musical works are rather of the strict school, you will take it for granted that there was nothing to complain of. I am afraid that the noise and the excitement of London will have driven me home before the third "Recital" of the Le Jeunes can take place, so I shall be unable to thrust my opinions on you with respect to it. I fancy I hear you say, "A good thing too."* Yours truly,

June 14*th*. J. CHAWBACON.

FRAGMENTS FROM THE STAR CITY OF MONTALLUYAH.

BY HERMES.

"A very curious book, very cleverly written. . . . Likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind."—Saturday Review.

"Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to this sublinary sphere as to those of another world. . . . Of his powers of narrative and expression there can be no doubt."—Morning Post.

"A romance of science. . . . Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."—Sunday Times.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1873.

THE Shah made his first acquaintance with Italian Opera before he set foot on English ground. In Berlin, the practical Germans did not flatter Persian Majesty by supposing that it could appreciate or enjoy any such thing. They took Nasr-el-Din to the theatre, and gave him plenty of dancing, which he very much admired, even breaking so far through Eastern gravity as to applaud. True, some little difficulty arose in consequence of an impression he had formed that the stage houris were members of the Emperor William's harem, but this was easily corrected, and all went well. The Belgians flattered the Shah by assuming that it was possible for him to sit out an Opera, while taking care to humour him in the choice of the work. L'Africaine was thought to be the daintiest dish to set before this King. It gave him plenty to look at, and, perhaps, a vague notion of fitness led to the selection of an opera which has so much to do with semi-barbaric pomp. L'Africaine, with its imaginary Madagascar, was followed by the ballet from Faust, with its imaginary things evil but voluptuous. What æsthetic and moral influence the revels of the Brocken had upon his Majesty we cannot tell; they may, possibly, have suggested that the Devil of the West is a personage worth knowing as having resources peculiarly dear to oriental tastes. But it is safe to say that the Persian monarch enjoyed the dancing, and did not repeat his little mistake anent the harem. We in England mean to flatter the Shah even more than our Belgian neighbours. We assume that he is able to appreciate Meyerbeer's music and Mdme. Patti's singing so far as to endure a long act throughout which the stage is shadowed in gloom. The Ophelia act of Hamlet will present him with a good specimen of theatrical scene-painting, and some strongly idealised rustics will dance while a young lady with her hair down, and fantastically dressed, performs certain vagaries, vocal and other, ending by committing herself to a stream which floats her first to the left and then to the right. In the second act of Faust there will be a little more dancing, and a display of mediæval German revelry, wherein the late Mr. Augustus Harris's dancing bear is certain to strike a sympathetic chord in the Persian breast. A bear muzzled and be-collared must suggest very pleasant thoughts to the near neighbour of Russia. But what will his majesty think of our western Devil as then presented—a Devil who sings, turns on good wine, with sulphurous tendencies, at pleasure; makes love, and generally demeans himself like a "man of the world." We would give a trifle for the Shah's private opinion of our Devil as embodied by M. Faure. Perhaps, when his Majesty goes home to Teheran he will write a book and tell us all about it. If so, we shall look in the index for the word "Devil" next after the names of the Lord Mayor and Gog and Magog. Seriously, whoever is responsible for to-night's programme at Covent Garden has made a mistake. What can a semi-barbarian like Nasr-el-Din care for good singing? The better it is the less he is likely to appreciate it, and we may venture to assert that the Persian potentate will find the performance a "bore" which might have gratified him with the poetry of motion and colour had wiser councils prevailed.

At the Albert Hall on Monday next, the Shah will carefully be kept out of hearing of half the concert, and conducted through a series of galleries containing pictures and other evidences of British enterprise, which, no doubt, he is expected to admire. On entering the Hall, a Cantata, composed in his honour by Mr. Barnby, will be an experience altogether new. The Shah has heard plenty of cannons fired in his honour, and been the object of innumerable "hurrahs," but Monday next has in reserve for him the first incense compounded of poetry and music. We hope he will like it, and a Persian would be no Persian if he did not feel flattered by a tribute so congenial. Meanwhile it is certain that Mr. Barnby has done his best to be worthy of the occasion, while the number and quality of the executive forces warrant a good ensemble. We are able to give an outline of the cantata, which is entitled, All Hail to the Shah! The work opens with a chorus, "Behold! from Persia's ancient land, a Prince goes forth in regal state," after which comes a soprano solo (to be sung by Mdlle. Tietjens), "Not now doth Persia's Lord lead on his warlike host." This is followed by a March founded on an original Persian melody, and leading to a chorus, "Who is this that landeth on Albion's rocky shore?" A grand fanfare for military instruments then introduces the concluding chorus, "All hail to thee, Shah! let their trumpets proclaim him." As eight hundred voices of the Albert Hall Choir will be supplemented by an orchestra of three hundred instruments, including several military bands, it may be imagined that an imposing effect will be produced. This will be England's musical homage to her distinguished visitor; and, in conclusion, we can only hope that the distinguished visitor will be able to trust its sincerity if he cannot wholly comprehend its expression.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE musicmaster of the Orphanage at Harderwyk, Holland, having found a great many sheets of parchment covered with musical notes, took it into his head to examine them more nearly. After doing so, he discovered that they dated from the period of the celebrated "Confraternity of Life in common," that is to say, from the fourteenth century, and that they contained the Gospel of St John set to music. They are in good preservation, and the writing is everywhere clear and uniform. When the religious revolution broke out in Harderwyk, that is, towards 1568, public feeling was very bitter against everything that recalled to men's minds the doctrines of Rome, and many pages of this gospel were, in consequence, torn out, cut into slips, and used to tie up parcels. Luckily, the Weser Gazette observes, these parcels were still in the Orphanage, and the hope is not lost of preserving in its integrity a monument which constitutes an interesting contribution to the history of musical art.

NOT very long since, Fanchonnette was revived at the Théâtre Lyrique, Paris. The following anecdote is related of its composer, Clapisson, who had, it appears, a mania for collecting musical instruments, not only violins, pianos, and so forth, but even whistles of all ages. One evening that he was at a second-hand dealer's, bargaining about some curious instrument or another, a gentleman entered the shop, and said: "I have come to fetch my whistle." The shop-keeper handed him an ivory whistle, wonderfully carved, for a very low price. No sooner did Clapisson behold this instrument than he recognized in it a masterpiece. He ran after the purchaser and offered a comparatively enormous sum if he would part with it. "Impossible," replied the stranger. "Not merely do I prize my whistle as a work of art, but I need it this evening—you understand—I am going to witness the performance of Fanchonnette."—A criminal idea entered Clapisson's head. "I will have the whistle!" he said to himself. An hour afterwards he was seated in the theatre by the side of the possessor of the whistle—or, rather, the possessor no longer, for the composer of Fanchonnette had glided his hand into the stranger's pocket and abstracted the whistle. He thought he was saved. At the conclusion of the overture, however, the Stranger, having searched all his pockets for the whistle, but in vain, took an enormous key instead. Clapisson could not stand this. "Sir," he said to his neighbour, "here is your whistle. I trust it will not make so much noise as the key." "Are you a thief, then?" enquired the stranger. "I am simply Mons. Clapisson, the composer of Fanchonnette," was the reply. The Stranger applauded all the evening.

FREDERICK THE GREAT'S passion for literature, especially poetry, is well known. But we were not aware of something a theatrical paper tells us, namely, that the kingly philosopher cultivated also the art of criticism. His opinions agreed generally with those of Voltaire, his illustrious correspondent. With regard to the drama, he liked only French comedies and the tragedies of Corneille. For him Shakespere was a barbarian who "mixed up day-labourers and grave-diggers with kings and princesses, and whose gross farces were only fit to make savages laugh." As regards opera, the warlike King patronised and aided with money Italian and French composers exclusively. On the other hand, he established a very severe censorship of the stage. "I will not allow," he wrote to Baron Arnim, "any theatre to be opened without my express consent. Keep watch especially over buffoons, rope-dancers, and other such riff-raff. I repeat that I absolutely forbid any performances, no matter of what kind, being given at Berlin without my personal consent." In other cases, when he did not wish to avail himself of his regal power, the prince made way for the journalist. "I have sent an article to the Berlin Gazette," he says in a letter to a confidant, "I have given it pretty sharply to Poier the choreograph. We shall get rid once for all of the insupportable fool. I am sorry only for one thing: his departure will necessitate that also of Mdlle. Rolard; but we shall find a way of supplying the places of both." All this took place in the midst of diplomatic embarrassments and the thundering of cannon.

THE Opinione says that Manzoni has left behind him a great number of manuscripts, some of which relate to his already published works. Among the most interesting of these are the manuscripts of the "Cinque Maggio" and "Inni Scari," which he presented to his son Pietro a year ago, and were left by the latter to his daughter after his death. His notes for the "History of the French Revolution," which are full of minute details, show that he spared no trouble to collect materials when he had any great work in hand. A portion only of this history has been completed; for while he was engaged upon it the Italian Revolution broke out, and Manzoni then conceived the project of writing a parallel between the two revolutions. Of the latter work the introduction only is complete. Manzoni was very particular about his style, and he often passed whole days in seeking a word or form of expression which would best render his meaning. His collection of letters is very abundant and interesting. He corresponded with many of the most eminent men of his time, and he kept copies of all his own letters to which he attached any importance; the collection thus affords much valuable material for the literary and political history of the last fifty years.

NEITHER the severest critic of the City Guilds, nor the greatest enthusiast for technical education, could object to the bestowal by the Draper's Company of about £900 for purposes very remotely connected with drapery. If a fair proportion of surplus funds were considered by all the companies to be as much due to hospitals and to the restoration of national monuments like St. Albans as to the dinner table, the great dinners would be less grudged, and technical education movements less forced upon the guilds than they are. But a recent gift by the Grocer's Company is more curious on account of certain associations connected with the trade. Mr. Matthew Arnold has sufficiently familiarised the English mind with the German title of Philistine as applied to a man who has neither "sweetness" nor "light"—to the typical bourgeois, who cares for art as much as Mr. Ayrton, or for culture as Mr. Miall. For some reason, or possibly for none, the word "grocer" is the French equivalent for Philistine. Why a grocer should have less sweetness or light in him than a tailor is hard to say; and most certainly the Grocers' Company, in sending £50 to the Royal Academy of Music, has bought £50 worth of claim to getting rid of the bad reputation of the craft for carelessness about anything beyond the limits of the till. There is, perhaps, little connection between music and groceries, but as there is small room for "technical education" in the trade, the company, by setting an example of encouraging art education, has done something to help what may be still more important.

RATISBON.—The second grand vocal and instrumental concert, given by the Musical Union, went off with great éclat. The principal orchestral works were Stanz's Concert-Ouverture, and the Jubel-Ouverture of C. M. von Weber, admirably executed under the direction of Herr Carl. Mdlle. Agnese John, from Munich, performed Variations for Pianoforte, by Beethoven; Prelude and Fugue, by Bach; Nocturne, by Field; and Valse, by Liszt, in a manner which procured her loud applause and repeated recalls. Mdlle. Cornelie Mespenheim, from the Royal Operahouse, Munich, sang the grand soprano air from Rossini's Barbiere; Haydn's song, "Bind auf dein Haar," and Taubert's "Vöglein, was singst du im Walde so laut," all of which were received with signs of marked approbation, while the last was encored.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The annual juvenile concert of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was given in the Crystal Palace. On previous occasions the great Handel orchestra was only partially filled, but on the occasion under notice it was covered with one unbroken mass of performers. There were present four thousand certificated singers, and the appearance of the vast assemblage was most imposing. The singers had each been provided with books in bright bindings, green, blue, or red, and when these were displayed by way of fan, and mingled sheets of bright colours with the white and scarlet dresses of the girls and the darker clothes of the boys, a very pleasing and lively effect was produced. There was, as usual, a large muster of the friends of the performers. The conductors were Mr. J. Proudman and Mr. W. G. M'Naught; the organist was Mr. F. Coward. The performance began with the hymn tune, "Glory be to God," which was followed by the part-song, "Breathless silence," the sacred part of the programme concluding with Keller's "Hymn of Peace." All were well rendered. After a short interval the secular music, forming the second part of the entertainment, included the school songs, "Old black cat," "Put your shoulder to the wheel," and the part songs, "If we knew," and "The evening bells." It concluded, as usual, with the National Anthem. The performance was a complete success.

The fourth annual concert of the Concordia Choral Society was given in Exeter Hall (lower hall) on Wednesday week, and attracted an audience which filled the room. The first part of the programme was devoted to Bennett's Woman of Samaria; Miss Banks, Miss Dones, Mr. A. James, and Mr. W. Prestridge being the principal vocalists. The charming contralto air, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," was capitally rendered by Miss Dones, and elicited much and deserved applause, as did Miss Banks's singing of "Art thou greater than our father Jacob?" The popular quartet, "God is a spirit," was very nearly being encored, and the tenor air, "His salvation is nigh them," was pleasingly sung by Mr. A. James. Some of the choruses were capitally given, among those best heard being "Come O Israel," and "Abide with me." That the performance proved satisfactory was shown by the marked applause with which it was received. Miss R. E. Merrick presided at the piano, Mr. A. Merrick at the harmonium, and Mr. J. C. Merrick was the conductor. The second part commenced with Gounod's "Trumpet blow" (La Reine de Saba) which was vigorously rendered by the chorus, and followed by a solo for violin, so well played by Mr. Otto Booth as to obtain an unanimous encore. Mr. Booth also gave (in conjunction with Mr. J. C. Merrick) Schubert's Sonata, for pianoforte and violin (Op. 137, No. 1). The songs contributed by the Misses Banks, Sugden, and Dones, and Messrs. A. James and F. Budge gave much pleasure.

Miss A. Stocken gave an evening concert in St. George's Hall on Friday week, which was attended by a select audience. The bénéficiaire selected Schumann's trio in D minor (Op. 63)—assisted by Mr. A. Burnett and Signor Pezze—for her first piece, and was warmly applauded at the conclusion of the performance. She also played some solos by Chopin and Schumann, and, with Signor Pezze, Beethoven's grand Sonata (Op. 69) in A major, for piano and 'cello, in each instance giving much satisfaction. Miss Stocken had the assistance, as vocalists, of Miss A. Dwight, Miss Mass, and Mr. Montem Smith. "Oh haste ye birds" (Gumbert) was capitally sung by Miss Dwight, and met with well merited applause. She also gave with success Venzano's "A che assorta." Miss Mass obtained a recall for a good rendering of "Ah s'estinte" (Mercadante). Mr. Montem Smith's contributions were Beethoven's "Adelaide," Schumann's "The Lotus flower," and "The joys of home." Mr. Shedlock was the accompanist.

Monsieur Paque's concert has always been one of the most interesting musical events of the season, and this year it proved no exception to the rule, for a large attendance of fashionable amateurs "assisted" on Monday, at the residence of the Marquis of Downshire, in Belgrave Square, where M. Paque's annual "solemnitié," as usual, took place. M. Paque provided a capital programme and capital artists. The vocalists were Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlle. E. Corani, Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Purdy; MM. Caravoglia, Jules Léfort, Monari-Rocca, and Gardoni. The instrumentalists, Signor Rendano (pianoforte), M. Colyns (violin), Mr. Hann (viola), MM. Libotton, Vieuxtemps, and Paque (violoncellos). Among the vocal "hits" were some mazurkas by Chopin arranged for the voice, and sung by Madame Lancia; Niedermeyer's "Les adieux" (Marie Stuart), by Miss Purdy, which, by-the-bye, would have produced more effect had it been sung faster; M. Depret's "Amour printemps," and M. Rey's "Le Rat de Ville et le Rat des Champs," given by M. Jules Léfort; Signor Tartaglione's "La mia fanciulla," sung inimitably well by Signor Gardoni; and Mr. F. Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," most charmingly rendered by Miss Catherine Penna. M. Paque generally commences his concert with a sterling work, and on this occasion he gave his audience a quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, by Schumann, in which M. Paque held the violoncello, and MM. Rendano, Colyns, and Hann, the other instruments; we need hardly say that it was capitally interpreted. M. Paque's solo performance was his own Fantasia on Irish Melodies, which received ample justice from its accomplished composer, and was listened to with evident delight by the audience, who warmly expressed their approval, both of the executant and of his compositions. The programme, consisting of nearly twenty "numbers," is too long to note in detail; suffice it that all the artists exerted themselves to please, and they evidently succeeded in doing so, judging from the satisfaction expressed by the audience after each piece. M. Paque may congratulate himself on the success of his concert, and his patrons may congratulate themselves on having had so agreeable an entertainment provided for them. Herr W. Ganz and Mr. H. Parker accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

Miss Kate Gordon gave a soirée, on Tuesday evening, at her residence, which was well patronised by her friends and pupils. Miss Gordon played pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, &c. Her pupils, the Misses Batlye, Norton, Margaret and Alice Herbert, performed some pianoforte duets to the gratification of all present. Miss Editn Montgomery, another pupil, sang Mattei's "Non è ver," most pleasingly. Miss Gordon, with Herr Liedel, gave a satisfactory interpretation of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 17, for violoncello and piano. The latter also played a solo of his own composing. Miss Lucy Franklein sang with feeling and expression, Benedict's "Rock me to sleep" (encored) and a song by Blumenthal. Mr. Albert James delighted all present by his excellent singing of Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" which was loudly redemanded. Mdme. Talbot-Cherer and Herr Stepan sang some solos and concerted pieces. Mr. William Carter presided at the pianoforte.

Mdlle. and Herr Heerman gave a morning concert, on Tuesday, at St. George's Hall. The concert commenced with a suite for piano, violin, and violoncello, a work of genuine merit, the composition of Miss Agnes Zimmerman, who played it in conjunction with Messrs. Heerman and Daubert. Herr Heerman played solos on the violin by Beethoven, J. Raff, and Brahms, and Mdlle. Heerman displayed her talent in several solos on the harp, by Godefroid, Alvars, &c. Mdme. Regan-Schimon sang a "Mater dolorosa" by M. Schimon, and some songs by Rubinstein and Schubert. Mdlle. Carola, in a song of Beethoven's and Sir Michael Costa's scena, "Dall' asilo della pace," distinguished herself by her excellent vocalization. Miss Zimmerman, in a prelude and fugue by Bach, and a canon by Schumann, played with care and judgment. Messrs. W. Ganz and Schimon were the accompanists.

Miss Lillie Albrecht gave her first concert, on Tuesday evening, at St. George's Hall, to a crowded audience, who were evidently pleased with the favourable début made by the young pianist. Miss Albrecht played a selection from the works of various composers, viz., Beethoven's "Sonata Pathetique," Mendelssohn's Scherzo in F sharp minor, Henselt's "A la Fontaine" (Etude), Thalberg's "Home, Sweet Home," and Ignace Gibsone's "Marche Brésillienne." Miss Albrecht has been, we understand, under the able tuition of the last-named gentleman. She possesses great execution, a firm touch, and she "phrases" exceedingly well. Miss Albrecht is very young, and bids fair, in time, to take rank amongst our best pianists. The young artist was assisted by Mdme. Lancia, Miss Enriquez, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Pyatt, who all acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience.

Madame Sidney Pratten's morning concert took place on Thursday before a crowded and fashionable audience. Madame Pratten has long been distinguished as a guitarist of eminence, which she fully exemplified on the present occasion by her performance of solos by Sor, Schulz, Giuliani, and some of her own compositions, in all of which she displayed her executive powers in perfection, and to the evident delight of all present. Madame Pratten also, in conjunction with a talented amateur guitarist (Dr. Gaisford), played a brilliant duet by Giuliani, and also some variations by W. Neuland, a German guitarist, who resided and taught the guitar 45 years ago in London, and who is still in the land of the living (at Bonn on the Rhine). Madame Martorelli Garcia sang with her accustomed brilliancy some Spanish songs, and had to repeat one of them. A young singer, Miss Cordelia Hale, gave M. Gounod's song, "My true love hath my heart," and was applauded by her friends. Signor Gustave Garcia and Herr Werrenrath were heard to advantage in songs by M. Gounod. Madame Lucci Sievers played with brilliant effect a solo on the harmonium of her own composition, "The tempest," which was received with much favour. Miss Madeline Cronin, in Chopin's Nocturne in D flat, and one of Mendelssohn's Preludes (in B flat), played with care and judgment. Mr. C. I. Duchemin also played a Berçeuse and Salterello for the pianoforte of his own composition. Mr. Richard Blagrove gave one of his favourite solos on the concertina with his usual success, and a limited choir, under the direction of Mrs. Weldon, who presided at the pianoforte and accompanied the vocal music, gave a selection of M. Gounod's part-songs.

Mr. and Madame Osborne Williams, and Mr. Alfred Baylis conjointly gave a morning concert at St. George's Hall, on Saturday last, which attracted a very full audience. They were assisted by Miss Katherine Pontyz, Misses Banks, Agnes Drummond, Pauline Vaneri, Messrs. Maybrick and F. Elmore as vocalists, and Mrs. Sydney Pratten, Herr Oberthür, and Richard Blagrove as instrumentalists. Miss Osborne Williams sang an "Ave Maria" (composed for her by Mr. E. Evans), a song by Signor Pinsuti, and another by Miss K. L. Ward, besides assisting in several concerted pieces, where her talent as a vocalist was well displayed. She sang, with Mr. Alfred Baylis, the duet from Il Trovatore, "Le mami ancor," at the conclusion of which both artists received much and deserved applause. Mr. Baylis sang in artistic style, Molique's "Stars of the summer night," and the popular cavatina from Faust "Salve dimora," making a most favourable impression on all present. The cavatina was received with deserved approbation, and Mr. Baylis was recalled. Miss Katherine Ponytz, in a new composition, "Down in a valley," by M. Ambroise Thomas (the composer of Mignon), gained laurels for herself with the public by her artistic singing. Miss Banks sang a new song by Mr. Osborne Williams, "The spring birds," receiving much applause. Mrs. Sidney Pratten and Mr. Richard Blagrove, each were encored in solos on the guitar and concertina. Between the parts Mr. R. H. Horne, author of "Orion," and well known to literary fame, sang a Spanish song, with guitar accompaniment, which pleased the audience very much. He gave it with true feeling and spirit. Herr Oberthür played his charming harp solo, "Clouds and sunshine," with his usual brilliancy and effect, as also did Mr. Osborne Williams in a fantasia for pianoforte by himself, on airs from Martha. Messrs. Ganz, Williams and Bucalossi accompanied the several vocal pieces on the pianoforte with their accustomed excellence.

PROVINCIAL.

Wrexham.—On the 11th inst. two concerts were given by Mr Harriss, the organist of St. Mark's, as a continuation of the opening ceremonies of a new hall just completed. The playing of the band of the 14th regiment, under the conductorship of Mr. Miller, gave the liveliest satisfaction to the audiences. Madame Billinie Porter, among other compositions, sang with taste and vivacity the valse, "L'ardita." Eos Morlais sang various songs; and with experience and diligent study he will, doubtless, prove a worthy vocal representative of the Welsh people. His best piece was "Sound an alarm." Mr. Harriss played some pianoforte and harmonium solos with success. The chorus consisted of the Mold Eisteddfod Choir, numbering about two hundred and fifty voices. The hall was well filled in the morning, and in the evening it was crowded.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

The Figaro thus noticed the concert given recently by Mr. W. H. Thomas:—

"A concert, given by Mr. W. H. Thomas, on Monday, deserves mention, as being for the benefit of one of the most rising young English pianists of the day. Mr. Thomas does not, like some recent examples amongst the adherents of the modern German school, gain his success by means of illegitimate straining after effect; he thoroughly despises tours de force and sensationalism, and is content to give a conscientious, tasteful, and correct (sine quâ non to English, though not needed to German ideas) rendering of the work chosen for performance. Mr. Thomas begins well; his future is in his own hands, and to make his future or mar it rests entirely with himself."

Mr. Barnett's Oratorio.

Pending our own article on The Raising of Lazarus, our readers may be interested to see the opinion of the Hour:—

"The performance of Mr. John Francis Barnett's oratorio The Raising of Lazarus by the New Philharmonic Society, at its fourth concert this season in St. James's Hall, was attended with the result anticipated from the preliminary hearing last Saturday afternoon—viz., a success as brilliant as any achieved by an English composer, and such an expression of approval from a concourse of musicians and amateurs of all countries, as well as of the general public, as must have convinced those who do not believe in native talent that genius and sound musicianship are not solely the heritage of foreigners.

In ideality, in contrapuntal knowledge, in the art of ingenious instrumentation, and the construction of happy devices, Mr. John Francis Barnett has throughout his new oratorio shown himself the equal of any living musician, and earned for himself a position in musical Europe which, were it not for that of a few contemporaries, might be characterised as unique. In one form of composition, and that the highest—viz., the oratorio—Mr. Barnett has certainly shown himself unsurpassed, and it is but justice to acknowledge that The Raising of Lazarus is a work fit to take its place beside the acknowledged trophies of the art. As space does not permit of any detailed analysis of the new oratorio, it must suffice to mention a few numbers which fully bear out the favourable verdict pronounced upon it. There are the overture and the finale to the first part; the opening chorus of the second part, 'O magnify the Lord,' the soothing air, 'Thou art near, O Lord,' which was sung to perfection by Mdme. Patey, the whole of the scene at the tomb, which is most graphically and powerfully illustrated, the exciting chorus, 'Give glory to the Lord,' the thanksgiving air, 'I will bless Thy name,' with which Madame Lemmens-Sherrington perfectly electrified the audience, and the concluding number, in which every resource at the command of the composer has been called into requisition. That the first part bears no comparison in merit to the second may be gleaned from the allusion we have made to only two of its numbers; but that the second part is a master-work needs no further confirmation. Of the performance, under the clever direction of the composer, much might be said; but as orchestra, chorus, and the soloists (Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Wilford Morgan, and Mr. Santley) vied in doing justice to their talented countryman's glorious composition, it would be invidious to particularise some points of excellence without alluding to all, so that we will only record that the execution of the new work did credit to all concerned. The reception accorded to Mr. Barnett was of the most flattering description. As the work progressed the applause became enthusiastic, and finally led to a complete ovation to the gifted composer, who had twice to re-ascend the orchestral platform, and bow his acknowledgments."

Future Music.

We take the following from the Sunday Times:—

"Both the Old and New Philharmonic Societies took a plunge into the 'future' last week, the former by producing Liszt's symphonic poem, Tasso, the latter by giving a long selection from Wagner's Lohengrin. We refrain from present discussion of these events, reserving our observations for next week and a more favourable opportunity. It may, however, be said at once that neither Liszt nor Wagner gained much by Philharmonic patronage. The first was heard with an ear half-astonished, half-bewildered, as one listens to the outpouring of gibberish delivered with the air of an oracle and the pomp of an orator. The second simply wearied his audience, and spite of occasional lapses into unintelligibleness, acted upon them like water upon sugar. The atoms of the crowd lost cohesion and drifted out into the street."

Liszt's "Tasso."

Speaking of the last Philharmonic concert, the Globe said:—

"The novelty of the programme was one of Liszt's Symphonic Poems, never before heard in this country. Having entirely failed, in spite of the most painful attention to the careful and clever performance of this work, to recognise in it more than a few passages, avowedly not the composer's, which could in any sense be called music—anything at the beginning that might not with equal propriety have been placed at the end, or anything in the middle which might not with advantage have been omitted altogether—we shall not attempt the task, in which even the accomplished author of the society's analytical programme has confessedly failed, of giving any account of the work. As an embodiment of the insanity, real or imputed, of the great poet, Tasso, whose name is connected with it, it may have its merits. A greater poet even than Tasso has, however, told us that even in the delineation of madness there should be method. We recognise none in Liszt's."

REVIEWS.

Robert Cocks & Co.

The Shah's March. Composed for the Pianoforte by J. Pridham.

Mr. Pridham is one of the first in the field with his pièce de circonstance, and, no doubt, will reap the reward of promptitude. The composer wisely abstains from any effort to give an oriental character to his music, and has turned out a piece which will be as interesting, for its own sake, when the visit of the Shah is forgotten, as now, when the Eastern monarch is in everybody's thoughts. An introduction, "Flourish of trumpets announce the arrival of the Shah," leads to the march proper, pomposo in E flat major, including two trios in B flat and A flat respectively. The rhythm is well marked, the themes are tuneful, and the whole is so easy that no amateur will have any difficulty in making it effective.

Madrid.—Imitating the example set by France, Señor Castelhar has proposed the foundation, in Rome, of a Spanish Academy, where young artists who have carried off the prizes at public examinations, and the most promising musical pupils, should be sent for three years. He suggests that the necessary funds should be furnished by private subscription, and not by Government. This is wise, as it might be rather difficult to find a government in Spain, when the aspirants for musical honours were ready to start on their journey.

Mannheim.—A new opera, Dornröschen, by Herr Ferdinand Langer, has been produced with decided success. The composer was called on at the end of every act, and the members of the orchestra presented him with a laurel wreath. This Dornröschen (The Sleeping Beauty in the Wood) must not be confounded with Anton Langert's opera, or Lindner's work of the same name.

ST. JAME'S THEATRE.

The accession to the company performing La Fille de Mdme. Angot of Mdlle. Desclauzas, the original representative of the part of Mdlle. Lange during both its "runs" in Brussels and Paris, has given a new interest to the already gay and graceful performance of this now world-famous opera-bouffe. The mastery acquired by this lady over all the means of effect offered by this most important character renders the result more important than it would be under any other circumstances. Mdlle. Desclauzas is an actress whose stately proportions demand an attention to mingled dignity and grace which are of great service in giving a special stamp to her delineation, and by obliging the actress to produce her effects more by finesse of insinuation than by broad strokes of expression greatly heighten its artistic value. As a vocalist she must be rated in that class whose skill in the management of their resources makes up for their limited extent. Mdlle. Desclauzas is undoubtedly a dashing and effective singer, and carries off her morceaux with a chic which enchants her audience; who, but for her laudable discretion, would have every piece of music in which she is concerned over again. The performance of M. Lecocq's work, so graceful, original, and dramatic, which is now to be witnessed at the St. James's Theatre, should be visited by all who wish to see opera-bouffe in its most acceptable form.

A DREAM AND ITS REALISATION.

In Ventnor, Isle of Wight, in the closing days of last April, lay sick at heart and dying Dr. Hopkins, Mus. Doc., Cantab. A musician of fame, organist of the University of Cambridge as well as organist of Trinity College, the world's eye was upon him, and every link in the golden chain of his treasured life had a great and a public value.

The grand old organ of Trinity, with its mellow flute tones and its rich and silvery voice, whereat the University doctor delighted so often to extemporise, was left by him in the early days of a long illness as a treasure in trusted hands. As his fiddle to Paganini, as his piano to Mozart, so was the swell organ in Trinity College Chapel to Dr. Hopkins. Delicious in its tone, full of beautiful stops, it was to him as a thing that hath life; as a chord that struck upon his soul. He doated upon it; it was a part of himself. And when he went in his long sickness, hoping and seeking for health in the soft, warm, ozone-laden breezes of our southern isle, it was with the solicitude of a parent parting with a darling child that he yielded his beloved instrument to a dear friend, Mr. Stamford, who was to share the duties of the doctor's office with Mr. Cobb, Fellow of Trinity.

It is at this point, and with this essential preface that our story begins. Like the feeble sunbeams that lingered each lovely eve of last glorious April on the long lines of broken cliff at Ventnor, the life of Dr. Hopkins was slowly passing away. Oft set the sun at the back of the heaving channel, deep in his bed of gold and purple, to rise again and find the doctor still alive. Cambridge missed him, as she always misses her learned and honoured sons, and many a prayer for his good was echoed in the antique rooms of each grand old college. The fashionable congregation which crowded his stately chapel of Trinity missed him and the "touch of that vanished hand." But the doctor was fated never again to return to his college home and his beloved organ. Yet stay! Not so fast.

In the midst of a daily ebb and flow of gloom and hope among the Cambridge admirers of the doctor as April wore away, Mr. Stamford, his friend and deputy had a remarkable dream. With a shudder and a start he awoke in the early morning of the 26th of April last, having dreamt that the doctor, well and hearty, had appeared and assured him that he should be in his familiar place at the organ on the coming Sunday. Somewhat startled, he looked at his watch. It was exactly two o'clock.

In the course of the morning, Mr. S—— accidentally encountered his Trinity friend and fellow organist, Mr. C——. "Ah, old fellow," said S——, nervously clutching his companion's arm, "I have had a most remarkable dream anent the old doctor," "I know exactly what you have dreamt," said the Fellow of Trinity in an agitated voice. "You have dreamt that the doctor appeared to you and declared that he would be found in his old place at the organ at the service on Sunday evening." "My vision precisely," said S——, startled at his friend's apparent penchant for divination; "but it is yet a secret." "Not to me," said C——, "for I have had a dream precisely like it, and I should not be surprised were the doctor really to return as he has declared." S—— shrugged his shoulders, and with a hope that the dream might be happily realized the two friends parted. They were not a little astonished on learning during the day that a telegram had been received announcing the death of the doctor at the precise moment of their strange dream.

Sunday came. The noble old chapel of Trinity College was crowded at eve with a fashionable congregation decked in all the lightest and brightest of summer apparel. The doctor was dead, and the dream was almost forgotten. S—— was at his organ as usual, the service commenced, but, strange to relate, not a note of the swell would speak, not a key would move! In vain S—— tugged at the stops, in vain he pressed with all his strength on the key-board, the row of keys was immovable, the doctor's glorious organ was silent! A flood of perspiration rolled down the organist's face as his dream and the doctor's grim declaration rushed to his memory, and the tremulous pulsations of his playing, so unlike S——'s masterly manipulations, were as an enigma to the critical congregation of Trinity. After the opening voluntary, S——, enervated almost to fainting, sought the cause of the organ's inscrutable caprice. 'Twas without success. The swell would not speak, the keys would not stir, and so to the end of the service.

When the audience had departed another attempt was made to play the swell, but now the organ spoke with its accustomed sweetness, and the keys rose and fell as before. The stops answered to the organist's grasp, and the doctor's favourite swell was itself again.

Such was the dream and such its realisation!

We give the above story as it has come to us, and, as it is in circulation at Cambridge, we leave our readers to form their own judgment on the matter. We have, no doubt, however, that they will shrewdly suspect that the "caprice of the organ" was due to something other than supernatural agency, especially when it is remembered that the occurrence took place in a region where practical jokes are by no means rare.

WAIFS.

Verdi was expected in Paris this week.

Mdlle. Anna Mehlig and Ole Bull have arrived from America.

Verdi has offered to write a Requiem in honour of Manzoni.

Mdme. Wilt (Vilda) has renewed her engagement at Vienna at a salary of 60,000 francs for nine months.

Monsieur and Madame Artôt-Padilla are now in Paris, and have just finished a brilliant tour of seven months' duration in Germany.

The Grocers' Company have given a donation of 50*l.* to the funds of the Royal Academy of Music, through Mr. Charles E. Sparrow.

Mdlle. L. Laya announces the removal of her "Classes for singing, and other branches of musical education," to her new residence, 53, South Street, Berkeley Square.

Four pupils of the Paris Conservatoire de Musique have been expelled the institution in consequence of their irregular attendances at the vocal and musical theory classes.

Herr Carl Jirmus, the young harpist, pupil of Mr. Oberthür, has been playing his master's concerto for the harp and orchestra with great success at a grand concert at Brünn.

Mr. John Jackson, A.R.A., the late organist and choirmaster of the Royal Naval School, New Cross, has been appointed organist and choirmaster to St. John the Baptist's Church, Leytonstone, Essex.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and their Imperial Highnesses the Czarewitch and his consort, honoured the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, with their presence on Monday evening.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has obtained leave to bring in a Bill authorising the Bank of England, in certain events, to issue an extraordinary amount of notes in exchange for securities. How much the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street will resemble Patti and Tietjens and Christine Nilsson! Bless her old heart. More power to her larynx. May her ability to utter notes abide for ever; may her voice never crack; may no length of years impair her utterance so as to transmute the bank-note from a soprano to a falsetto.—Punch.

The names of animals given to plants are mostly verbal corruptions, and not derived from any animals they have been thought to represent. Thus Hare-bell is from the Welsh Awyr-bel, meaning a balloon, and should be called Air-bell. Foxglove is the Redglove from the Latin Fuscus. Swallow-wort should be Sallow-wort, from the yellow juice which exudes when the stems are broken. Horse-radish is from a Welsh word signifying bitter, and might as well be called after an elephant as a horse. Hence Horse-Chestnut (Bitter-Chestnut) and Horse-Mint. Sow-Thistle is a corruption of Sooth—that is, Soft-Thistle, from its thistle-like leaves, the prickles of which are too soft to wound. Gooseberry is a corruption from Gors or Gorse, a thorn, and should be called Thorn-berry or Gorse-berry, from its prickly bush. These corruptions are curious, and have been mostly caused by mistakes of the ear in turning one language into another.

Signor Tito Mattei announces his annual concert for this evening at St. James's Hall. The attraction of Signor Mattei's performances, together with the list of first-rate artists who "assist" him, will, we trust, bring him a "bumper" house, notwithstanding the counter-attraction of the Shah's visit to the Royal Italian Opera.

Apropos of the Shah's reception at Brussels a correspondent of the Telegraph wrote:—

"Both inside and outside the station the regiment of the Carabineers performed the service of honour. Their band, under the direction of M. Labory, played a Persian March composed by Strauss. Apropos of the music, there is an amusing story to tell. M. Labory had obtained a Persian national air which he caused his musicians to learn, taking great pains to have it well executed, but almost at the last moment he was informed that this national tune had become in the course of political changes a revolutionary air, a sort of 'Carmagnole,' the strains of which would be certain to have a singular and far from pleasant effect upon the nerves of the ruler of Iran. Hardly knowing what he ought to do, the director of the band decided at last to play the Persian March of Strauss in place of the piece he was now obliged to abandon. In practising the march the clever conductor forgot only one thing, namely, that the composer had sought to make the music a kind of imitative harmony suggestive of the mewing of the feline race, but the Shah did not seem to notice the omission."

"At ten o'clock this evening"—writes a correspondent from Brussels—"the State dinner at the Palace being over, his Majesty the Shah and their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians attended a gala performance at the Opera House. The interior of the theatre presented a grand and brilliant appearance, all the fashion and distinction of Belgium's capital being gathered in it, to say nothing of the picturesque richness of the Eastern costumes. Her Majesty was conducted into the Royal box by the Shah, while the King gave his arm to the Countess of Flanders. The whole of the audience rose when they entered, and gave them a most enthusiastic reception, raising loud cheers that were repeated again and again. The Shah bowed as if well pleased by the compliments he was on all hands receiving, and showed more signs of enjoyment than is usual with him. The opera was Meyerbeer's L'Africaine, which, abounding as it does in striking spectacle, was well chosen for the occasion, and was performed in a manner worthy of a city which has achieved so high a dramatic and operatic reputation as Brussels. With equal good taste the grand ballet from Gounod's Faust was produced."—16*th June*.

A handsome new reredos for the choir of Exeter Cathedral is now in course of completion, the work designed by Sir Gilbert Scott, at an estimated cost of £1.625, and executed by Messrs. Farmer and Brindley, sculptors, of Westminster Bridge Road, London. The expense will be defrayed by Dr. Blackhall and the Rev. Chancellor Harrington conjointly. The summit of the reredos rises to a height of 22ft. above the floor of the choir, the materials consisting of marble and Derbyshire alabaster, with precious stones. The centre compartment of the reredos is occupied by a sculptured group in alabaster representing the Ascension, the figure of the Saviour being 3½ft. in height. The figure of St. Peter, to whom the Cathedral is dedicated, has likewise a prominent position, while on either side of the Saviour appear angels. The Transfiguration and the Descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost are also represented, the reredos occupying about a third of the space at the east end of the choir. The central compartment alone will cost £900, and the estimate of £1,625 for the whole work will be considerably exceeded. The restoration of the edifice is progressing, the cost, independent of the reredos and other special funds, being set down at £40,000. From the Oxford Committee £484 has been received, the fellows of Exeter College having jointly subscribed £100.

The evidence in the Tichborne case was relieved on Thursday week by the introduction of a literary discussion in which Colonel Lumley Graham, the Lord Chief Justice, and Dr. Kenealy took part. The subject was Paul de Kock, the character of his works, and his influence for good or bad on his readers. Colonel Graham declared that he "did not know a more immoral writer in French literature," which seems to show that he has never read Eugène Sue, Théophile Gautier, Alexandre Dumas fils, Gustave Flaubert, Ernest Feydeau, Gustave Droz, and other highly popular French authors of the present day, including, in particular, M. Adolphe Belot, perpetrator of "Mdlle. Giraud," "Ma Femme," and "La Femme de Feu," works which were found unfit for publication, as M. Belot originally wrote them, even in the Figaro. The humour of Paul de Kock is often coarse, and even indecent; but the morbid pruriency, which is the chief characteristic of the contemporary French novel, is no more to be found in his writings than humour is to be found in the writings of Dumas fils and Feydeau. The Lord Chief Justice disposed of the whole question as to the immorality of Paul de Kock's novels in a sentence which is worth remembering:—"Paul de Kock," said his lordship, "in his search after the ridiculous is unscrupulous; but whether he preserves delicacy or violates it, he does not seek to inflame the passions'

Mdlle. Carlotta Patti, M. Theodore Ritter (pianist), and M. Bresson (violinist), have gone for a month's tour in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, under the management of M. Ferdinand Strakosch.

L'Art Musical speaks of an unpublished work by Beethoven, entitled Ballet des Chevaliers. The manuscript is in the possession of M. Dulken, the pianist, and is said to have been written in 1790, for Count Walstein, and performed at Bonn. There are eight numbers, respectively termed, Marche, Chant Populaire, Chasse, Chant de ménéstrel, Chant de guerre, Chanson a boire, Valse, and Coda. An arrangement for piano solo and duet will shortly be published by Leon Escudier.

When any note is sounded with sufficient force near a pianoforte, the wire representing the same note may be heard sounding in what is called sympathetic vibration. The other wires will be unmoved. If several voices or instruments sound tones near a piano, and little paper riders are placed on all the strings, those only will leap off which are on wires in unison with the notes sounded. Thus a pianoforte can analyze the wave confusion of the air into its constitutional elements. Recent anatomical discoveries seem to show that the process which goes on in our ear is probably very like that just described. In the cochlea, a cavity filled with water in the internal ear, some very remarkable formations have been discovered. They consist of innumerable plates, microscopically small, arranged in order, side by side, like the keys of a piano. They are connected at one end with the fibres of the auditory nerve, and at the other with the stretched membrane. Elastic appendages, like stiff hairs, have also been lately discovered at the ends of the nerves in the vestibulum. The anatomical arrangement of these appendages leaves scarcely any room to doubt that they are set into sympathetic vibration by the waves of sound which are conducted through them. And it is a probable conjecture that each appendage is tuned to a certain tone, like the strings of a piano, from our experience of which we can see that when one tone is sounded, the corresponding hair-like appendage may vibrate, and make an impression on the corresponding nerve-fibre.

MUHLHAUSEN (THURINIGA).—Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's oratorio, Die Zerstörung Jerusalems, was lately performed, under the direction of Herr G. Schreiber, and produced a deep impression. The part of Jeremiah was admirably sung by Herr Bletzacher, of Hanover, full justice being done also to the other principal parts.

POTSDAM.—A highly satisfactory performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio of St. Paul was recently given by the members of the Vocal Union for Classical Music, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Wendel.

STUTTGART.—The management of the Royal Opera have at length succeeded in securing the long sought tenor in the person of Herr Ucko, whom they have permanently engaged at a salary of 10,000 florins (a thousand pounds sterling) a year.—Mdlle. Hänisch, from the Royal Opera, Dresden, has been playing a short engagement, her first character being that of Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento.

MILAN.—Verdi has written to the Syndic offering to compose a Funeral Mass in honour of Manzoni. The offer was, of course, eagerly accepted. The Mass will be executed on the 22nd May, 1874, the anniversary of Manzoni's death. Verdi himself will superintend the rehearsals and conduct the performance. Should the performance be given in the Duomo, there can be no female chorus, unless the clerical authorities can be prevailed upon to abrogate for this particular occasion the usual rule, which prohibits the presence of female artists in church choirs.

ROME.—The Teatro Apollo was opened for a few nights in celebration of the "Festa dello Statuto," the municipality giving the manager, Signor Jacovacci, a sum of thirty thousand francs towards the expenses. The result was not satisfactory. The campaign commenced with the ballet of La Contessa d'Egmont, and a dramatic company. This entertainment was a failure, so Lucrezia Borgia was got up in a couple of days, the band being recruited partly from this capital and partly from Florence, as the regular members of the orchestra were otherwise engaged. The two principal characters in the opera were sustained by Signora Fricci and Signor Fraschini, but neither the lady nor the gentlemen were overwhelmed under the weight of laurels they gathered.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

MESSRS. DUFF & STEWART, 147, OXFORD STREET, have the pleasure to announce that they have entered into arrangements with Madame BALFE for the Publication of the late M. W. BALFE'S Grand Opera, now in active rehearsal at Her Majesty's Opera.

Drury Lane Theatre was the scene of the great triumphs of this talented Composer; and it was his last wish that this work should be first performed in the scene of these former successes. The Director has unqualified pleasure in being enabled to accede to this desire of a distinguished musician, whom any country would gladly claim as its own. This important event will doubtless give a special interest and eclat to the Season. Sir MICHAEL COSTA has kindly consented to superintend the production of this great work, which is a sufficient guarantee that it will be perfect in all its details. Madame CHRISTINE NILSSON will create the character of "Edith Plantagenet."

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

By Joseph Seiler.

To these youthful labours, which have all been lost, belongs a small drama, which Meyer composed at the suggestion of Father S. J. Alexius Baur, Professor of Rhetoric at Lucerne, and which "obtained the full approval of the numerous auditors present."

About the end of the year 1738, a resolution, which, probably, had long been germinating and striking root in his breast, came to maturity. Meyer determined on leaving the world and entering the Cistercian Order.

It was not without opposition from his family that he set out for the Monastery of St. Urban, which he reached on the 31st Oct., 1738, and where he was received as a novice on the 8th May, 1739.

Soon after his entrance into St. Urban, he began to be sickly, and—so says the Chronicle—the music was not to his taste. In short, after remaining a novice only twenty-six weeks, he left the monastery, and "on the 31st October, at 4 o'clock in the evening, set out for Lucerne from St. Urban, where on the same day and at the same hour, anno 1738, he had arrived, having thus resided exactly one year in this holy and famous house."

After 1740, we find him in Italy. He spent nearly two years in Milan, in the house of von Krenglin, the Imperial agent, and a friend of his grandfather. Concerning his stay at Milan and his studies there, the Chronicle gives us a long and detailed account. We will, therefore, again let it speak for itself:

"It was in listening to Italian music that he first became aware of the difference between that music and the music of his own country. Every imaginable opportunity was afforded him of seeing the best operas, of hearing the most splendid sacred and chamber music, of going to concerts given by members of the highest classes, and of frequently visiting the houses of leading singers, male and female, and of musicians. Under the circumstances he laid aside composing for a time, and, impelled by such incomparable music, applied himself to the piano, in order, by hearing these compositions, as artistic as they were agreeable, to accustom himself to a peculiar harmony and skill in playing; and (though he studied simultaneously arithmetic, mathematics, geometry and drawing), to the astonishment of many, he learned in so short a time a most extraordinary and brilliant accomplishment, after the present elegant and masterly manner" (in Italy, on the model of Domenico Scarlatti) "that he was not only highly esteemed by everyone, and enjoyed free access into all the first houses, but had not the slightest reason for fearing the best chapelmasters in his line; and this was a well-known fact then in Milan."

"The especial honour which he enjoyed on all sides in Milan so excited his ever-increasing zeal for music that, to obtain a satisfactory knowledge of the violin as well, he chose for his master the celebrated Ferdinando Galimberti, of whom he took lessons some months, in which time he learned, according to Corelli's rules, to bow correctly and to finger, besides acquiring a thorough knowledge how to compose in the very newest taste."

On the viola and the double-bass, also, Meyer acquired tolerable skill. But "his strength in musique was always on the piano, the organ, and in composition." In the year 1740 he published a few Piano Sonatas which created a great sensation, and were long held in high repute.

A few years previously, young Pergolese died (16th March, 1736) at Torre di Greco, near Vesuvius. He had scarcely passed his twenty-sixth year, and his fame, founded principally on his celebrated Stabat Mater, resounded from one end of Italy to the other. In his first sacred compositions, dating also from the year 1740, Meyer took Pergolese as his model, being indebted to him for the accompaniment—very independent considering the period—to his vocal parts, and the frequently brilliant character of his instrumentation.

Meyer's art-loving grandfather died in 1741. As war had meanwhile broken out between Sardinia and Spain, and was assuming greater and greater proportions, Meyer, Senr., bought our hopeful composer an officer's commission in Von Keller's Swiss Regiment which had just been formed.

From this point the Chronicle describes with great minuteness the events of the war, but they would interest the reader very little. I will content myself, therefore, with mentioning that, with whatever zeal and success he attended to his military duties, Meyer von Schauensee was never untrue to art, but, on the contrary, distinguished himself in composition (studying, besides the masters already named, their contemporaries, Tomaso Traëtta, Guiseppe Sarti, and Francesco Majo—but of the Germans, in all likelihood only Hasse—and pianoforte-playing.)

To about this time belong his 40 airs on words by Metastasio. They were subsequently (in 1748) engraved, and we shall refer to them presently. At the same period, at Ceni (principal town of the similarly named province of the then kingdom of Sardinia, on the Nura, with 20,000 inhabitants), he made the acquaintance of the young and charming Countess Lovera, who "fell in love, not only with his pianoforte playing, which was admired more and more by everyone, but even with him personally, and the feeling increased so on both sides that, had not the regiment been obliged to march from Sardinia shortly afterwards, a musical marriage would very speedily have followed."

On the 17th June, 1743, "at the command of his Colonel," he played on the march before the English Consul at Villafranca, "the Consul taking leave of him with all the special honours due to his birth, and with the warmest expressions of gratitude, which the said Consul corroborated the following day by sending him 12 large bottles of English beer, a cassetta of Nice wine, and other costly refreshments, in an English ship's launch."

In October of the same year, his dramatic cantata, Il Trionfo della Gloria, with Metastasio's words, was performed, the then celebrated singer Signora Bruna taking part in the performance, which Meyer himself conducted; and on the 11th November of the same year, in honour of the Colonel's birthday, Metastasio's operetta, Palladio conservato, the last being several times repeated, "both in the Colonel's quarters;" and, on the third occasion, in the palace of the Bishop of Cagliari, "when it was sung with great applause before an innumerable concourse of the nobility, everybody being waited upon with all kinds of refreshments, and the place being magnificently illuminated."

After the performance the Viceroy, "who had stood all the time next the Archbishop and his brother, General Barol, gazing fixedly with much attention at this artistic work, said the following words: 'Monsieur! vi sono molti maestri con barba griggia che non sanno la mità di quello che sa Lei.' (Sir! there are many masters of music with grey beards who do not know half as much as you do')." A "Te Deum," also, and an occasional dramatic piece, Applausi festosi, the words by an Abbate Ratti, were composed at this period by Schauensee, in honour of a victory over the Spaniards. All was written in the inevitable Italian German manner then usual. "After this operetta. . . . which concluded amid uninterrupted applause. . . . the ball was opened in the usual manner, and lasted till beyond midnight."

Several sonnets, canzonets, and other laudatory productions then published—some being got up in a costly manner—contributed not a little to make the name of Meyer von Schauensee popular throughout the Italian Peninsula.

But an end was put only too soon to this splendid musical life in Sardinia, "that earthly paradise," as the Chronicle terms it. the regiment being ordered to march to Nice. Here there was some very sharp fighting. Meyer von Schauensee was made prisoner, but allowed to go home on parole. His parents, despite all his offers and threats, now insisted on his definitively leaving a military life (December, 1743). They immediately procured him an important post in the Great Council at Lucerne, and in the so-called New Court.

He now applied himself most zealously, with all the means he possessed, thanks to his aristocratic birth and his high official appointments (which left him a great deal of spare time), to elevate and perfect, after the models with which he had become acquainted in Italy, musical matters in his native town. His reputation was strengthened not a little by this course, and he soon received from all quarters requests—with offers of advice and assistance—that he would exert himself to regenerate sacred and theatrical music in Switzerland—"which redounded greatly to his honour, but, at the same time, stirred up also ill-feeling among those whom he rendered unnecessary."

A NEW ORATORIO.

The production of a new English oratorio is an event of special interest which ought to receive corresponding attention, above all when the author is a man of unquestionable ability. Quite as a matter of right, therefore, do we now give a prominent place to Mr. J. F. Barnett's Raising of Lazarus, which was performed for the first time in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday week, at one of the New Philharmonic Society's concerts.

The work in question, it should first of all be said, is not new in the sense of being recently composed. Its date, we believe, is prior to that of The Ancient Mariner, the cantata which Mr. Barnett wrote for the Birmingham Festival of 1867, and, consequently, it represents the author's past rather than his present ability. At the same time there is no reason to doubt that Mr. Barnett has thoroughly revised his music, leaving nothing in it that does not commend itself to his more matured judgment and taste. The libretto could not so easily be overhauled and revised, and we take leave to doubt whether Mr. Barnett would now select such a subject for a full-sized oratorio. A work of this kind is, in effect, a drama subject to dramatic rules, and expected to meet dramatic exigencies. The choice of a story should, therefore, be made with careful reference to distinctness and variety of character, contrasts of incident and cumulative interest. All these requirements the subject of Lazarus does not satisfy. Its materials, though enough for a cantata, are not enough for an oratorio, and hence they demand a good deal of that "padding" which consists in making the principals and chorus comment upon what is taking place. An example presents itself in the early part of Mr. Barnett's oratorio. After a recitative stating that, when Jesus heard of the sickness of Lazarus, "He abode two days still in the same place where He was," come, first, a duet, "Why turnest thou Thy face away?" next, a chorus, "Blessed are they whose hope is in the Lord their God;" and next, a contralto air, "Wait on God with patience"—all being reflections springing out of the drama, and not forming an integral part of it. In pointing this out, let us not be understood to find fault with the construction of the book. The texts are, for the most part, appropriate and well chosen, and the interest of the narrative is fairly distributed. What should not have been done is the choosing of a story that required so much "Greek chorus" to attain the necessary bulk. But the story of The Raising of Lazarus is otherwise unfit for oratorio. It lacks contrast to a degree which must have hampered Mr. Barnett very seriously. From the opening chorus to the actual performance of the miracle, just prior to the end, one tone prevails, and not an incident arises to give relief to somewhat melancholy monotony. That the composer has succeeded at all in overcoming an obstacle so serious is greatly to his credit; but we could have wished for him a fairer field—one which might assist his efforts rather than be a drag upon them. Having chosen the subject, however, Mr. Barnett decidedly made the best of it, and the result is a work wherein his abilities find admirable assertion.

The first part of the oratorio comprises that portion of the story which ends with the setting out of Jesus and the disciples for Bethany. In this the incidents are the distress of the sisters at the delay of Jesus, their joy at hearing from a messenger the words of the Master, "This sickness is not unto death;" the prayer of Lazarus for support and comfort, the remonstrance of the disciples when Jesus announces His return to Judea, and their final resolution to go and "die with Him." A chorus, "Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord," very appropriately ends this division of the story. The second part sets out with the appearance of Jesus at Bethany, and the complaint of Martha, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Then come the interview of Mary with her brother's friend; and, lastly, the scene at the grave, all the incidents of which are, of course, fully detailed. A very lengthened ascription of praise and thanksgiving, led by the resuscitated Lazarus, then ends the oratorio.

We shall not go, seriatim, through the thirty-one numbers of Mr. Barnett's work, being necessarily limited, in a great measure to general observations, which may appropriately begin with a full and frank recognition of the ability shown by the composer. At the time when the music was written Mr. Barnett made no pretension to absolute individuality of style. Strongly under the influence of Mendelssohn, like many other able followers of that attractive master, he was satisfied to write according to the impression made by Mendelssohn upon his artistic nature, and, hence, The Raising of Lazarus belongs emphatically to that class of oratorio at the head of which stand St. Paul and Elijah. In this there is no reproach whatever to Mr. Barnett, who did very wisely to write as he was moved by the inspiration of the moment, and not risk success in a struggle after originality. A young musician need never be ashamed of yielding to the fascinating genius of Mendelssohn, any more than Beethoven was ashamed of having begun to write in the school of Haydn and Mozart. But if the music in the new oratorio suggests the model upon which it is formed, it also suggests, with greater force, the author's skill and sound musicianship. To the latter point we would direct special attention at a time when young composers everywhere are breaking through orthodox rules and permitting their untrained talents to disport themselves without reference to anything save a desire to be striking, even at the expense of coherence. Mr. Barnett adheres to the "ancient lines" of art, and his music quite refreshes us by its honest conformity to regulations which genius has approved and the public instinct has accepted. On this account alone we should be disposed to look favourably upon the new oratorio, and to commend it as a worthy addition to its class. But The Raising of Lazarus has other claims to approval. From first to last it runs on fluently, and with an ease which shows the resources of the composer. It is often highly expressive, and, when occasion offers, as in the scene at the grave, becomes quite pictorial. Moreover, the frequent employment of a contrapuntal style gives a scholastic interest to much of the music, while Mr. Barnett's unquestionable skill in laying out his matter so as to produce the greatest effects from voices and orchestra is illustrated to a remarkable extent. In brief, the workmanship of the oratorio is nearly always excellent, and, when joined to the fluent tunefulness of the themes, a result is produced more than able to secure a favourable reception for the work.

That a careful examination of the work will support these general observations we have no doubt at all, and they may fittingly be supplemented by reference to such numbers as made the greatest impression at the performance. At their head, because coming first, must be placed the spirited fugue, Allegro moderato, which is the second movement of the overture. Though largely extended, the interest of this fugue never slackens, and its contrapuntal skill makes a very favourable impression on ears to the manner trained. A tenor air, "Show forth Thy wonderful mercies," is very melodious and pleasing, while wholly free from pretence of any kind. There is good and effective writing in a chorus, "Blessed are they," and devotional feeling in a contralto air, "Wait on the Lord with patience." An unaccompanied trio—de rigeur in oratorio since Elijah—though it was encored on Wednesday, has nothing of special interest to recommend it: but the recit. and air of Lazarus, "Lord, when wilt Thou look upon me," contains some of the best music in the work—music not to be heard without pleasure. The soprano and contralto duet, "O, Lord, why hast Thou cast us off," is a little secular in treatment, but it also makes a striking effect by reason of truthful expression. A melodious soprano air, "They that sow in tears," next carries on the interest of the work, followed by a dramatic chorus of disciples, "The Jews of late sought to stone Thee," and an interesting scene wherein the disciples and their Master refer to the condition of Lazarus. The quartet and chorus that ends the first part contains a good deal of Mr. Barnett's most fluent and ready counterpoint, though, on the whole, it is hardly on a scale of sufficient grandeur and dignity. Continuing these mere indications of merit, we may next point to the opening chorus of the second part, the "second subject" in which is a charming bit of melody. There is charm, also, in a soprano air, "Yea, Lord, I have believed," but the succeeding chorus, which takes up the theme, strikes us as a little commonplace in treatment. The Coda, however—a passage in chorale style—wants nothing of force and impressiveness. In the contralto air, "Thou art near, O Lord," we have one of the best of the numerous family generated by "O rest in the Lord." This was beautifully sung by Mdme. Patey, and obtained a deserved encore. A fluent air for tenor, "Blessed are they that mourn," next commands attention, after which comes some thoughtful music descriptive of the scene in Martha's house before setting out for the grave. The bustling, mocking chorus of Jews, "Could not He that opened the eyes," is a welcome contrast to the prevailing tone of this part of the work, and there is much dramatic effect, gained by unpretending means, in the entire scene at the grave of Lazarus. Attention should particularly be directed to a dramatic chorus, "And presently he that had been dead," which is one of Mr. Barnett's finest and most successful efforts. From the subsequent numbers we may select for approving mention a dashing soprano air, "I will bless Thy name," finely sung by Mdme. Sherrington, a telling scena for bass solo and chorus, and a demonstrative bass air, "Praise ye the Lord," which Mr. Santley delivered with immense vigour and effect. Other numbers might be mentioned, but these will suffice to show that in the new oratorio we have a work of interest and value.

Mr. Barnett conducted with great skill, and received at the close of his task a well-deserved tribute of admiration. We should not omit to add that the tenor solos were delivered with unfailing correctness by Mr. Wilford Morgan, who appeared instead of Mr. Vernon Rigby.

MUNICH.—M. Maillard's opera, Les Dragons de Villars, under the German title of Das Glöcken des Eremiten, has been produced at the Royal Operahouse with considerable success. The part of the heroine was exceedingly well sustained by Mdlle. Stehle, who was efficiently supported by Mdlle. Schefzky, Herren Schlosser, Kindermann, and Theodor Meyer, the representatives of the other leading parts.

VISIT OF THE SHAH TO THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The State performance ordered by the Queen at the Royal Italian Opera in honour of the Shah was equally successful with the visit to Woolwich. There were two attractions—the procession through the Floral Hall and the operatic representation. Mr. Gye, who, in the course of his 25 years of management, has already had the task of organizing no less than three grand state receptions—the visit of the Emperor and Empress of the French during the Crimean war; that of the Prince and Princess of Wales on the occasion of their marriage; and that of the Sultan of Turkey—can boast of sufficient experience in such affairs. The completeness of his arrangements for the welcome of the Shah of Persia is the result of that experience. In the Floral Hall Mr. Gye has now a valuable auxiliary, which he turned to the best account. As a reception Hall on these imposing occasions it could not be excelled; and its immediate connexion, by means of the grand staircase, with the "crush-room," which on Saturday night was set apart as an antechamber to the State-box, is of such advantage that one might think it had been constructed especially for the purpose. Although the decorations bore a close resemblance to those prepared expressly for the Sultan some years ago, the general aspect of the Hall was in some respects materially different; on the former occasion the visitors admitted to witness the cortége were obliged to stand behind barricades, but now there were seats for many hundreds—not merely in numbered chairs at each side of the nave of the building, but in new galleries erected for the accommodation of a vast number. A gallery of wide dimensions stretched along almost the entire length of the south aisle, and another called the "Tribune Gallery" at the west end led directly to the stage of the theatre, enabling those furnished with "passes" to hear the National Anthem, and obtain a complete view of the State box on the first rising of the curtain. Lastly, the platform on which the artists are accustomed to appear at the Floral Hall Concerts was raised. Thus another gallery had been erected for the convenience of those who came to witness a procession of notable personages, headed by the Oriental potentate. Even as it was the accommodation might have been extended; for many who would gladly have obtained admission were compelled to go away disappointed.

The decoration of the Floral Hall was at once simple and beautiful. The ceiling was adorned with festoons of artificial flowers, in white and light pink—a canopy of flowers, in short. These festoons were elsewhere distributed with equal judgment, while the crimson hangings and carpets, aided by the brilliant illumination from numerous rows of gas jets and stars, together with a new and effulgent "sunlight," under the dome, enhanced the general effect, gratifying the eye with a mixture of colours, harmonious and nowhere obtrusive.

The arrival of the Shah, who was expected to leave Buckingham Palace at a quarter past eight, when we remember what he had gone through during the day, was commendably punctual. A detachment from the Scots Fusilier's band appeared a little after eight; then, instalment by instalment, came in the members of our own Royal Family, the officers of the Royal Household, the Cesarewitch and Cesarevna (Princess Dagmar), and a host of distinguished personages—all in state costume or uniform. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Arthur, and the Duke of Cambridge received the Shah at the foot of the stairs (western door), and, after friendly salutations between His Persian Majesty and some of those who caught his attention, Mr. Gye took charge of his distinguished guest, and the cortége was marshalled into order. The military band played in succession the Russian National Hymn, in honour of the Cesarewitch, our own National Anthem, and the so-called Persian National Hymn. As the procession, headed by the Shah who escorted the Princess of Wales, moved slowly up the Hall, the spectacle, with its variegated surroundings, was nothing less than gorgeous. No sooner had the staircase been reached, and the procession, amid much cheering, gradually disappeared, than there was a general struggle among those in the "Tribune Gallery" to make their way behind the curtain to the stage. A great many, it is to be feared, were disappointed, for the access was by no means easy, and the curtain was ordered to be raised on the very instant of the Shah's appearance, which, in consequence of the short route he took, was speedily effected. Whoever succeeded was well rewarded, obtaining an unrestricted view of the theatre. There, in the midst of the grand tier, was the State-box—the Shah as central figure, with diamond epaulettes, and enormous emeralds, diamond aigrette, diamond scimitar belt, diamond bands—blazing, in short, with diamonds and precious stones. On one side of him sat the Princess of Wales, the Cesarewitch, the Duke of Cambridge, &c.; on the other, the Cesarevna, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, Prince Arthur, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, &c.; behind him, for the most part standing, were many distinguished members of his Court and Household. Close to the State-box was another box, allotted to the Princess Louise and Prince Leopold. Constructed out of six boxes, on the Grand Tier, the State-box bore a close resemblance to that erected for the Sultan of Turkey, with its canopy, gilded crown, and surmounting flags of gilt and silver. Six more boxes in the tier above were appropriated to other personages belonging to the retinue of the Shah. The theatre was crowded to the roof by a brilliant audience.

The instant the curtain drew up the familiar strains of our National Anthem were again heard; and all the house, including His Majesty of Persia and the rest, stood up, the audience for the most part turning their faces to the box which was the cynosure of attraction. Then followed the operatic selection provided by Mr. Gye for his illustrious guest. Looked at as a whole, this was excellent, the only fault being that, the earlier exertions of the Shah in the course of the day taken into account, it was decidedly too long. This sort of entertainment must be very nearly, if not altogether, strange to His Majesty. The programme consisted of a scene from the second act of Dinorah, in which Madame Adelina Patti sang the famous "Shadow Song;" the final scene from Hamlet, with Mdlle. Albani as the deranged Ophelia; and the second and third acts of Faust e Margherita—the characters in which (we need not name them) were sustained by Madame Adelina Patti, Mdlle. Scalchi, Mdme. Anese, Signor Nicolini, MM. Faure, Maurel, and Tagliafico. The first and last were conducted by Signor Vianesi, the second was under the direction of Signor Bevignani. What seemed to excite the especial attention of the Shah was the "Shadow Song," the death scene of Ophelia, and the lovely scene of the Kermesse in Faust. Patti dances, after her own inimitably quiet manner, in the first; Albani prepares for the final catastrophe among a bevy of village dancers; and the second act of Faust contains plenty of dancing, illustrated by a waltz tune, which, though composed by a Frenchman, might have been signed "Weber" without any danger of its authenticity being disputed. In all these His Majesty was evidently interested. Still more gratified, perhaps, was he with the vigorous and stirring march of Signor Vianesi, styled the "Persian March," and including, as an episode, a characteristic air of undoubted Persian origin. This, under the direction of its composer, was performed by the orchestra of the theatre, accompanied by a contingent from the band of the Grenadier Guards, with such well-sustained fire and animation, that the whole audience rose and loudly applauded—their faces again turned to the State-box. The Shah, himself, and all around him, rose to acknowledge the compliment; the audience insisted upon a repetition of the March, and repeated it was accordingly. Between Hamlet and Faust His Majesty and most of the occupants of the State-box were conducted by Mr. Gye—considerate host—to the refreshment room, and so there was a brief and by no means unwelcome interval. During the third act of Faust, admirably as it was given by all concerned, the Shah was apparently overcome with the labours of the day. He nevertheless stayed it out manfully, and did not leave the theatre until the orchestra once more played "God Save the Queen," rising, as before, with the entire audience. Mr. Gye, who had been in the State box during the act of Faust to which we refer, then escorted His Majesty, who was conducted by the Lord Chamberlain to his carriage, the cheering of the crowd outside being renewed as if they had been waiting outside during the entire performance to renew it.

THE SCHUBERT SOCIETY.

The fourth concert of the season was held on the 18th June, for the benefit of the director, Herr Schuberth. The audience was not so large as on former occasions, owing, no doubt, to the unpropitious state of the weather. The first part of the programme was devoted to compositions of the president, Sir Julius Benedict; and the following members appeared and fully acquitted themselves:—Pianoforte, Mdlle. Morgen, and Miss Jessie C. Hincks; violin, Herr Jung; Violoncello, Herr Schuberth; vocalists, Mr. C. H. Sanders, Mr. Albert James, Mdlle. Romanelli, and Misses Kate Thomson, Grace Armitage, and Emily Muir. The second part was miscellaneous, when, in addition to the above artists, Monsieur Libottom, (violincello) and Herr Hause (pianoforte) appeared.

This is the last concert of the season, and the seventh year of the Society, and the director is to be congratulated on the success which has attended his efforts.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The fifth summer concert was devoted to a performance of Acis and Galatea, a work which, although written for the stage, is best as a Cantata di Camera.

That such popular music was done full justice to need hardly be recorded. The chief vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Santley, and the choir, strengthened by professional assistance, was that attached to the Crystal Palace. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington's singing of the songs allotted to Galatea cannot be surpassed. Mr. Sims Reeves often selects "Love sounds an alarm" as one of his greatest displays, and his singing of this renowned air excited the usual amount of applause. Polyphemus' recitative "I rage, I burn," and the succeeding air, "O, ruddier than the cherry," is never heard to so much advantage as when rendered by Mr. Santley, and the effect this number produced on Saturday was, as usual, highly exciting. Mr. Montem Smith in "Would you gain the tender creature," was also highly successful, and much applauded.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students gave a concert at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Thursday evening (June 19th). The following is the programme:—

"Fugue, in E (MS.), for two Performers on the Pianoforte (Miss Baglehole and Mr. A. H. Jackson) A. H. Jackson (student); Aria, "Nobil Signor" (Huguenots) (Miss Roffe), Meyerbeer; Allegretto and Presto Agitato, from Sonata quasi Fantasia (Moonlight. No. 1, Op. 27, Pianoforte) (Miss Blake), Beethoven; Song, "Ave Maria" (Miss Perry) Schubert; Fantasia on an Irish Air, Pianoforte (Mr. Rose), Mendelssohn; Duet, "Venezia" (Miss Buley and Mr. Howells), Pinsuti; Two Musical Sketches, in B flat and G minor, Pianoforte (Miss Fernandez), Mendelssohn; Canzone, "Marinella" (Mr. Wadmore), Randegger; Præludium et Fuga, in E minor, Pianoforte (Miss Oliveria Prescott), Mendelssohn; Serenade, for Female Voices, "Lightly creeping" (Solo, Miss Spencer, Miss Goode, Miss Bagnall, Miss May, Miss Beasley, Miss Jones, Miss Edouard, Miss Mount, Mrs. Mann, Miss Roffe, Miss Hope, Miss Buley, Miss Bradley, Miss Mayfield, Miss Bolton, Miss Kaupp, Miss Barkley), Schubert; Song (MS.) "The sea hath its pearls" (Mr. Dudley Thomas), Eaton Faning (Mendelssohn scholar); Romance, in F, Violin (Miss Julia de Nolte), Beethoven; Terzetto, "Pensa e Guarda" (Margherita d'Anjou) (Mr. Wadmore, Mr. Pope, and Mr. Aldersey), Meyerbeer; Lento-Bravura, in B (No. 6), from Suite de Pièces, Pianoforte (Miss Curtis), W. S. Bennett; Trio, "Eventide" (Miss Beasley, Westmorland scholar, Miss Barkley, and Mr. Howells), H. Smart; Sonata, in A major, Pianoforte (Miss Turner), Scarlatti; Song, "The beating of my own heart" (Miss Daniel), G. A. Macfarren; Allegro, from the Seven Characteristic Pieces, Pianoforte (Miss Boxell), Mendelssohn; Part Songs, "Sweet stream," "Come, live with me," W. Sterndale Bennett.

Miss Chaunell, Mr. Walter Fitton, and Mr. Eaton Faning accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte. The next students' concert is announced to take place at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Thursday evening, July 10th.

LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The third and last of the series of performances projected and conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie (with the intention of benefiting certain metropolitan charities) took place at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon, when a large audience was attracted by the many interesting features of the programme, which included the re-appearance of Mdme. Christine Nilsson, Mdlle. Tietjens. Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini, Signor Campanini, and Signor Agnesi. The four last-named artists were heard in the solo music of Rossini's Stabat Mater, which formed the first part of the concert; and Mdme. Nilsson sang—in the second part—an air from one of Bach's Church cantatas (Englished as "My heart ever faithful"), with violoncello obbligato, skilfully played by Mr. Edward Howell; Handel's air, "Let the bright Seraphim," with the admirable trumpet obbligato of Mr. T. Harper; and the solo passages in the National Anthem at the end of the concert. The second part commenced with Handel's Coronation Anthem, "Zadok the Priest," in which, as in the Stabat, the co-operation of a band of 100 instrumentalists and a choir of 800 vocalists enhanced the general effect. Other pieces were comprised in the selection, to which Signor Rota also contributed.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The seventh concert, and last but one, of the sixty-first season took place on Monday evening, when the following selection was performed:—

Part I.—Jupiter Symphony, Mozart; Romanza, "Sin dall' età più tenera" (Iphigenia in Tauride), Gluck; Concerto for pianoforte, Brahms; Aria, "Dove sono" (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Overture, Tannhäuser, Wagner. Part II.—Symphony, No. 8, in F, Beethoven; Lied, "Al suon di tua melode," Mendelssohn; Overture, Precioso, Weber.

Although the above programme is one of great and varied interest, it offers little to call for comment, nearly every item being familiar from frequent repetition, with the exception of Brahms' concerto. Of this work, however, we spoke on the occasion of its clever performance by Miss Baglehole (a prominent student of the Royal Academy of Music), at a Crystal Palace Concert last year. On the occasion now referred to, the highly-cultivated mechanism and careful preparation of Herr Jaell were evidenced in his execution of an elaborate composition which especially calls for those qualities. Gluck's Romance, and Mendelssohn's Lied (sung by Signor Gardoni), were given as Italianized—the one from the original French; the other from the well-known Auf Flügeln des Gesanges. The latter was accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Cusins. Mozart's aria was assigned to Miss Whinnery, of whose merits we have several times recently spoken. Mr. Cusins conducted the performances with his usual care. The last concert of the series is announced for July 7, when the programme will comprise Beethoven's seventh symphony (in A), and a symphony by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, second son of the great John Sebastian.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT'S CONCERT.

This concert—which has been for many years past one of the specialties of the London musical season—took place on Monday afternoon, for the third time, in the Floral Hall. Madame Adelina Patti, Mdlle. Albani, and other eminent members of the Royal Italian Opera Company contributed various successful performances, among which may be particularized the brilliant singing of the first-named artist in the Polacca from I Puritani, and Sir J. Benedict's popular ballad "The Rose of Erin" (encored), and the effective execution by the other prima donna of Donizetti's scena and aria, "Ah! che infelice," and "The Blue Bells of Scotland" (harp obbligato by Mr. J. Thomas). A demand for a repetition of the Highland ditty was replied to by giving "Robin Adair." Both artists were associated in the duet "Sull' aria," from Le Nozze di Figaro, which was also encored. Miss Edith Wynne contributed an expressive song of Sir J. Benedict's entitled "Love at Sea." Madame Patey, too, was heard, in addition to the numerous operatic artists. Among the novelties brought forward was a concerted movement, Patria e Liberta (composed by the concert-giver), which derived full effect from the co-operation of the principal solo baritones and basses, and the choristers of the Royal Italian Opera. Sir. J. Benedict's well-known skill as a pianist was exemplified—in association with MM. Charles Hallé, F. H. Cowen, and Lindsay Sloper—in an arranged version for two pianos (by Mr. Sloper) of his duet on "A Dream of the Past" and "Gallop Brilliant." Another pianoforte piece, by the same composer—the fantasia on airs from Der Freischütz (adapted for two pianos by Mr. F. H. Cowen)—was cleverly played by Sir J. Benedict's two youthful pupils—the Misses Molyneux. M. Vivier, the celebrated cornist, was heard in an obbligato accompaniment to a new song of his own composition; and Madame Norman-Néruda contributed two violin solos. Seven conductors were named in the programme, including those of the Royal Italian Opera—Signor Vianesi and Bevignani. As heretofore, the concert attracted a very large audience.

Bonn.—The preparations for the Schumann Festival, to be held here next August, are in full swing. The first programme has been somewhat modified. The festival is to last only three, instead of four days, as originally intended, and Brahms' Requiem, which would have taken on the first day, is, in consequence omitted. The Committee have engaged, in addition to the artists already secured, Mdme. Wilt, from Vienna, and Herr Diener, tenor, now of Berlin, but formerly of Cologne.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

Madame Wilt has just signed a fresh engagement with the management of the Imperial Operahouse. She is bound to that establishment till the 31st May, 1874, without a break. In 1874, she will sing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London, during the months of June and July, and from 1875 to 1878, both inclusive, during the months of April and May as well, at a salary of 12,000 francs a month. During the other eight months, Madame Wilt will sing at the Imperial Operahouse here, her salary being 3,000 florins a month. It is stipulated, also, that she is to sing the part of Ophelia in M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, and that of the Queen of Night in Die Zauberflöte, and, also, that she shall appear at least six times a month. At the expiration of the four years she will take her leave of the stage. She has been a member of the company at the Imperial Operahouse about six years, during which time, if we count her three appearances as "Gast" or "Visitor," she has sung three hundred times; she has appeared in Norma, 30 times; in Il Trovatore, 36 times; in Don Juan, 32 times (Donna Anna 13, and Elvira 19 times); in Lucrezia Borgia, 28 times; in Die Zauberflöte, 24 times (First Lady 10, and Queen of Night 14 times); Le Nozze di Figaro, 28 times; Ernani, 6 times; Les Huguenots, 32 times; Le Prophète (Bertha), 32 times; Lohengrin (Ortrud), 6 times; Un Ballo in Maschera (Amalie), once; Tannhäuser (Elisabeth), 20 times; Robert le Diable (Alice), 21 times; Euryanthe, 4 times; Armida, 3 times; La Juive, 7 times; L'Africaine, 3 times; Die Entführung (Constanze), 9 times; and Così fan Tutti, 3 times.

Madame Rosa Csillag gave a concert, on the 9th inst., in the small room of the Musical Union. She sang an air from Le Prophète, and an air from La Juive; "Ich grolle nicht," by Schumann, and "Vertrauen," by Eisser. Herr Grünfeld, from Berlin, performed several pieces on the piano, and Herr Friesberg, a violinist from Leipsic, Paganini's "Hexentanz." The concert concluded with the quartet from Rigoletto, in which Madame Csillag was supported by Herr Deckner, Dr. von Raindl, and Mdlle. Orlanda Riegler.

THE CHOIR AND CONGREGATION.

The arguments in favour of congregational singing are sometimes so presented as to imply an antagonism to the service of a trained choir. Indiscreet allusions are made to "hired singers," "worship by proxy," "operatic performances," and the like, as if the praises of the congregation were simply impossible without the abolition of the choir. Over-zealous advocates inflict serious damage on the song service when they thus assume a conflict of interests between parties who are essential to each other. A fallacy of these disputants lies in the assumption that a choir must necessarily monopolize the music of the sanctuary, and reduce the congregation to a mass of inactive, perhaps protesting, listeners. A more obvious fallacy consists in taking it for granted that every choir is a band of "hired singers," whose sole business is to "worship by proxy," and contribute to æsthetic gratification by their "operatic performances." It is much to be regretted that the question of public praise should be thrown into confusion by the injudicious form in which, sometimes, the discussion has been conducted. A practical and dispassionate view of the case would prevent much of the thoughtless error and cheap witticism with which the subject has too often been treated. The relation of the choir to the congregation is one of mutual dependence and reciprocity. The two parties are engaged in a common work, each in its own sphere being complemental to the other. Neither of them can befittingly trench on the duty of the other, or take upon himself the service of both. To determine the limits within which each is supreme is to set at rest a gratuitous and mischievous controversy.

Congregational singing is made up by each individual expressing himself in song. The highest type of worship for the individual is the act of the individual himself. No one can perform that act for him. What he does himself affects him as he cannot be affected by a similar act done by another. He may silently assent to a religious truth formulated independently of his own participation; but when he utters it with his own lips, he confirms himself in the possession of that truth. No choir can rightfully deprive the worshipper of this high and profitable privilege. Congregational singing is the expression of praise in its greatest volume. There is a power in a multitude of voices which is at once peculiar and impressive. There are waterfalls more beautiful than Niagara, but none so overwhelming. The indiscribable effect produced by a thousand voices engaged in consonous song cannot be secured by any ordinary choir. All dissonances are swallowed up in the tremendous torrent of harmony. Even the cultivated ear gives up for the time its demand for exquisite execution, for the sake of that inspiring combination of sound which disarms criticism, and carries the unresisting soul on the tide of congregational praise. No performance of a skilled choir, however faultlessly rendered, can serve as a substitute for the mighty volume of song which is poured forth from a large body of devout worshippers. On the other hand, the praises of a congregation are most effectively rendered when they are directed by a disciplined choir. All experience goes to show that the singing of a religious assembly is best conducted under the leadership of a few trained voices. An organist alone finds himself in helpless subjection to the multitude whom he is attempting to lead. A precentor can do little more than strike a phrase or two in the beginning, and then suffer himself to be engulfed in the billows that overpower him. Little knots of singers, catching their time from the strongest voice in their locality, will follow their respective leaders, while Asaph bellows and gesticulates in vain to bring these different groups into anything like concerted utterance. A good, strong choir, sufficiently commanding to hold these asteroidal sections in the prescribed orbit, is a necessity, in order to secure the highest and best effect of congregational singing. Then, a choir is needed for forms of musical service beyond the ability of any congregation. There are times when the greatest benefit that can be conferred on a man is to make him passive, while some one else enters into his consciousness and interprets his wants as he himself would find it impossible to do. Thus it is that the minister, gathering up the experience of his congregation, gives vocal form to that experience when he leads the congregation in public prayer. As the heart of the silent worshipper is moved by the faithful reflection of his inner life in the petitions of the pulpit, so is he affected by a reverent listening to the voice of sacred song in the choir. In both cases, the conscious need of his own soul is set before him more effectively than would be possible if he were to attempt to express it himself. This is one of the solemn offices of the choir—to give musical utterance to the faith and experience of the congregation, and do it in such form and manner as that, if not so done, it must necessarily remain unperformed.

There is no contrariety of interests, therefore, between the choir and the congregation. Let the choir faithfully fulfil its function of leading the praises of the congregation in their richest and freest volume, and let the congregation gratefully acknowledge the service of the choir in those more complete forms of musical expression which no congregation can ever construct for itself.—New York Musical Gazette.

SOMETHING FROM PARIS.

(Extract from a Letter.)

The select society of the real Théâtre Français will muster in force to-morrow at the funeral of their young sociétaire, Mdlle. Marie Rogers, who died yesterday, after only enjoying a short three months the dignity which is the aim of every Parisian actor. Quite young, she had been elected unanimously a member of the exclusive society, so well had her rôles been played, especially in Andromaque and Le Gendre de M. Poirier. She had also gained much applause in the prologue of Maître Pathelin, and La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes, and promised to be a worthy rival of the many distinguished actresses who have been pupils of the Conservatoire.

The less dignified neighbour house in the Palais Royal has just produced some novelties—Rallye-Champ doillard, an operetta, in one act; La Clarinette Postale, a "lever de rideau;" and a little farce, Les Esprits des Batignolles. The first had been already performed on the semi-private stage of the Cercle Artistique, Place Vendôme, and is a lively squib of society.

Much flutter is going on in the theatrical world anent the benefit for Frederic Lemaître, and the rival critics of the various newspapers have arrived at challenging pitch in their anger at the prohibition of La Fille de Madame Angot at the Opera House. The Liberté, by the pen of "Jennius," stirred up the Cercle de la Critique Musicale et Dramatique to vote against the play, as a breach of dignity, at the Academy of Music; and, in revenge, the critics of the Gaulois, Figaro, and other influential newspapers, have sent in their resignations to the club.

The manager of the Folies Dramatiques, the home of La Fille de Madame Angot, certainly plays rather a trump card this morning by announcing that Tamberlik, who happens to be in Paris, is not too grand to come and sing in his small theatre, since the stage of the Grand Opera is too mighty for such a work of charity as the benefit for Lemaître.—June 23.

FRAGMENTS FROM THE STAR CITY OF MONTALLUYAH.

BY HERMES.

"A very curious book, very cleverly written. . . . Likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind."—Saturday Review.

"Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to this sublunary sphere as to those of another world. . . . Of his powers of narrative and expression there can be no doubt."—Morning Post.

"A romance of science. . . . Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."—Sunday Times.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1873.

THE position of the public with respect to the music-publishing trade essentially differs from its position towards the book-selling trade. Music is purchased, beyond comparison, most exclusively by those who themselves play and sing, and consists, therefore, only of such as come within the sphere of their powers of execution and of their taste. Thus the regular market depends upon the majority of half-educated amateurs, whose taste is influenced principally by the music master, or the performances of virtuosi. The wants of Vocal Associations and Concert-giving Societies are of a different kind. Very limited, on the other hand, is the number of thoroughly educated musicians who purchase music with independent judgment and serious interest, in order, for pleasure or for instruction, to gain a comprehensive view or a connected knowledge of their art, either in certain special branches or on a more extended scale. Professional musicians have not always the education or the wish, and frequently not the leisure, for pursuing studies of this description. In most instances, the necessary means are wanting. Even at the present day it is but seldom that music is made the object of really scientific, and more especially historical, research, demanding a comprehensive apparatus; and consequently there is an almost total want of great collections, commenced and continued on a definite plan. With the exception of the great libraries of Berlin, Munich, and Vienna, there is probably scarcely a library in Germany that recognises and fosters music as a subject entitled to a separate department of its own; even the Conservatories and similar institutions appear not yet to have experienced the necessity of musical collections calculated for something more than the mere passing requirements of the moment. The system of supporting public libraries—a system of such moment in the case of literary enterprises of more than ordinary extent—is so seldom available for the music trade that it can scarcely be regarded as an element to be taken into consideration. The music trade is, therefore, immeasurably more dependent than the book-trade upon the wants of the day and all its caprices; and this affinity with the fashions explains many a peculiar phenomenon; such, for instance, as the decoration of the title-pages, to which we may generally apply the words of that modest critic who said: "It may not be in good taste, but still it is an ornament;" the custom, so unfavourable to historical research, and even to mere curiosity, of omitting the year of publication; and much more of a similar description giving a volume of music the look of a book of fashions. Though certainly arising in the first place from the fact that, on account of its having to be engraved, music costs more to print in proportion to the average sale than books cost, the high price of music is connected with the above considerations. It results from the constitution of the public that large editions constitute rare exceptions in the music trade, and that those works that do not go off at all, or in only small numbers, bear a larger proportion to those which find a sale than is the case in the book trade. A popular work has, therefore, to make up for the losses occasioned by a number of works which have not proved successful; and it need not be remarked that works which are good in a business sense, are not always so in an artistic one. A piratical publisher can, for this reason, easily sell at low prices, as he pays the author nothing, and prints only what his experience tells him has a large sale, without his being obliged to purchase that experience by ventures which do not cover the expense of production. The high price is connected, likewise, with the exorbitantly heavy discount usually allowed to the retail houses; but it also results, at least partially, from the peculiar position occupied by the public of musical amateurs. As an almost general rule, the music masters undertake to be the agents between the music-publishers and the purchasing public; the allowance which they claim has gradually become, in their eyes, a well-earned right, or, at least, an item of revenue they cannot conveniently spare, and which they possess sufficient influence to maintain. With such deductions we can very well understand that the shop-price must be fixed very high.

Though we may assume that what is printed in the way of books rightly represents, on the whole, the state of scientific and artistic production in literature, we cannot assert this to anything like the same extent of music. Until the last third of the eighteenth century, in Germany as in Italy, an overwhelming majority of compositions were circulated only in manuscript copies, that is, in every respect, in a highly unsatisfactory manner. It certainly sometimes happened that, in order to ensure greater publicity for them, composers etched their own works: as for, instance, we know that Bach and Telemann did. At that epoch, therefore, mere casual circumstances exercised the greatest possible influence in determining which compositions should become extensively known, and which be hoarded up for, and rendered accessible only to, a subsequent generation. Thus the most uncertain standard for forming a just appreciation of any master is that furnished by his printed compositions: we have no right to assume either that the works of the best masters, or the best works of such masters, were made public by means of the printing press. A striking instance of this is furnished by Johann Sebastian Bach, of whom only very little was published during his lifetime. Even that little included not his great masterpieces, but merely the instrumental compositions, for which, at any rate, a considerably extensive public of pianists and organ players was to be expected. It was not till after the revival of the Matthauspassion, by Zelter and Mendelssohn, that Bach's vocal compositions began to be snatched from oblivion; and for years to come the Bach Society may go on publishing unprinted works, not one of which is without its peculiar significance. Of such a master as Hasse, who, for more than a generation, reigned supreme on the stage of Germany and Italy, only detached compositions have been made known by means of the press; in short, it is an exception when the labours of a celebrated composer are to be estimated by his printed works. In London, on the contrary, most of Handel's grand compositions were immediately printed; and in Paris, it was even the rule for operas to be engraved on being performed, a fact to be explained by the grand scale on which things are done in both those cities. The system, it is true, has since then been completely changed; and, at the present time, it is more especially the music-publishers of Germany who keep in view the high mission of permanently preserving great works of lasting value. But though, now-a-days, nearly all the works of any importance written by the principal masters—masters who exercise a determining influence—are printed, and thus preserved for the enjoyment and study of future generations, such works constitute only an extremely small portion of the mass of music brought into the market. Nor does this music, in the majority of instances, at all represent those superior, sterling composers, men with high and noble aspirations, who only under especially favourable circumstances succeed in seeing printed what they have created in true devotion to art; it represents only the caprice that changes with the hour, and the defective education of amateurs, who will never be at a loss for complaisant pens. Hence we may assert that, on the whole, the labours of the composers of our time, even though the history of art may never, or only imperfectly, become acquainted with them, are more serious and more important than the mass of printed works would lead us to expect—a fact which cannot in any way be declared of literature.

STUTTGART.—The performance of Schumann's "Faust Compositions," got up by Herr Stockhausen in the Königsbau, excited great interest, and attracted a very large audience, both from the city itself and from the neighbouring "Bad" of Cannstadt, celebrated for its mineral springs. The impression produced by the music itself was not as favourable as the admirers of the deceased composer could have desired. The part of Faust was sustained by Herr Stockhausen, and that of Gretchen by Mdme. Walter-Strauss. The other vocalists were Mdlle. Löwe, Mdme. Hegar, Herren Schütky, A. Jäger, and Hromada, the conductor being Herr Abert.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

JOSEPH HAYDN was a rare instance of musical fecundity. Between his eighteenth and seventy-third year, he composed 119 symphonies and overtures; 163 pieces for the viol da gamba; 20 divertissements for various instruments; 3 marches; 24 trios; 6 solos for violin; 15 concertos for different instruments; 30 sacred operas; 83 quartets; 66 sonatas; 42 duets; 5 German operas for marionettes; 5 oratorios; 366 Scotch airs; and 400 minuets and waltzes.

JOSEPH II., Emperor of Austria, had a fine bass voice. On one occasion he composed two trifles, and, on another, a grand air. The latter he inserted in one of the Italian operettas performed before him in his private theatre at Schönbrunn. No one was to know who wrote it, and all did know, Mozart among the number. "Mozart, what do you think of the air?" said the Emperor. "Well," replied ingenuously the celebrated composer, "the air is good, but he who wrote it is a great deal better."

THE signal for closing the Great Exhibition, Vienna, was at first given by means of bells, but, these being deemed insufficient, recourse was had to another method. This is an enormous horn, the invention of an Italian engineer. It is very simple in form, and is furnished with a metal tongue connected with a steam engine. The sound it emits varies with the pressure of steam applied. Such an instrument would be exceedingly useful on the sea-coast, as it can be employed, like a telegraph, alphabetically.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE last of the four concerts given by the Glee and Madrigal Union was numerously attended. Those English composers whose names are associated with a style of composition which may properly be called national were represented by Dr. Callcott, W. Horsley, M.B., T. Attwood, S. Webbe, and Sir John Goss, whilst the execution of the music, written for equal voices, was, as usual, undertaken by Messrs. Baxter, Coates, Land, and Lawler. More perfect quartet singing has rarely been heard, and we question much if the musical heroes of the Elizabethan period had their works so exquisitely sung as their later disciples. The solo singing was also interesting. Mr. Coates's rendering of Attwood's "Soldier's Dream" was worthy of Vaughan. Mr. Lawler's magnificent voice gave the best effect to Callcott's "Friend of the Brave," whilst Miss Jane Wells, in Bishop's "Should he upbraid," was thoroughly efficient. Perhaps, like every other musical institution in London, the Glee and Madrigal Union has suffered from the surfeit of musical entertainments which have been given, but, artistically, it has never been better supported. Mr. Land and his party were warmly congratulated by many of the subscribers at the close of last Saturday's performance.

At a concert given in St. George's Hall, last week, the proficiency attained by Miss Lillie Albrecht, under the tuition of Mr. Ignace Gibsone, was very satisfactorily displayed. Miss Albrecht's classical taste was shown in two solos which have long been recognised as masterpieces—viz., Beethoven's "Op. 13," and Mendelssohn's Scherzo, in F sharp minor; as, also, was her acquaintance with modern styles by the performance of Thalberg's arrangement of "Home, sweet home," and Mr. Gibsone's "Marche Brésilienne." In all these pieces Miss Albrecht succeeded in gaining the applause of her friends and exciting interest in her talents. The introduction of a pleasing rêverie of her own composition was attended with no less felicitous results. The singing of Madame Florence Lancia was the artistic feature of the concert. Mr. Guy and Mr. Pyat also were successful in their respective songs. The accompanists were Herr Ganz, Mr. Gibsone, and Mr. C. E. Stephens.

MILAN.—Herr von Flotow's opera, Naida, has been produced at the Teatro Manzoni, but has not created any very great enthusiasm. The libretto is generally condemned, while the music, though sometimes fine, is considered greatly inferior, on the whole, to that of L'Ombra and of Marta. The principal characters were well sustained by Signorina Tagliana, Signori Bacci, Brogi, and Marchisio. Another, but more successful novelty at the same theatre is Il Viandante, words by Signor E. Praga, music by the Duke Giulio Litta. The music pleased extremely, as did also Signora Pasqua and Signor Piazza, who were charged with the two leading parts. The noble composer was called on repeatedly to receive the applause of the audience.—In token of his satisfaction with the libretto of Fosca and with that of Salvator Rosa (which latter he is now setting), Senhor Gomez lately presented Signor Antonio Ghislanzoni, the author of the said librettos, with a splendid piano, bearing a suitable inscription.—Signor Faccio has been re-engaged for three years as conductor at the Scala.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—We find in the Freeman's Journal, of June 17th, a long account of Herr Elsner's annual concert, which took place in the Ancient Concert Hall, before a large audience. We extract the following remarks:—

"There appeared to be a very general desire to pay Herr Elsner a high compliment, as no other professional musician in the city stands higher in the estimation of the public than he does. Amongst those who gave their valuable assistance on the occasion were Mrs. Joseph Robinson, Sir Robert Stewart, Mr. Sproule, Mr. R. M. Levey, Mr. Hemsley, Mr. Gray, Mr. Grattan Kelly, and also a number of ladies and gentlemen amateurs, principally pupils of Herr Elsner, who joined most gracefully to show their respect and esteem for one deserving of both. The concert opened with Haydu's Quartet, No. 61, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. It was played admirably by Mr. Levey, Capt. Ruxton, the Hon. S. W. Skeffington, and Herr Elsner, and the first part of the concert was brought to a close by a most interesting performance, in which three of the pupils of Herr Elsner took part. We allude to Franz Lachner's Serenade for four violoncellos, which was played admirably by the worthy Herr V. Yeo, Mr. Elrington, and Dr. Cruise. The gentlemen who came forward to pay a most graceful tribute of respect to their teacher, have shown an excellent example in giving practical proof of their esteem and regard for an amiable man and a truly accomplished artist. The second part of the concert was opened most brilliantly by Mrs. Joseph Robinson and Mr. C. V. Stamford. They selected a pianoforte duet of Mozart, which they rendered faultlessly. We have to congratulate Herr Elsner on the success of the concert of yesterday, which reflected honour on all who took part in it."

REVIEWS.

STANLEY LUCAS, WEBER & Co.

Any Like Thee. Words from BAILEY'S Festus. Music composed by H. A. RUDALL.

THIS is a very charming song—charming alike as to words, melody, and accompaniment. It is, moreover, adapted to be very effective in the concert-room; and we do good service to tenors on the look out for a good thing by advising them of the fact. Any work of the kind more entitled to popularity we very rarely see.

JOSEPH WILLIAMS.

I saw Him on the Mountain. Song. Poetry by JAMES BIRD. Music by JOHN BARNETT.

WHEN the author of the Mountain Sylph, Fair Rosamond, and Farinelli, opens his mouth, it behoves us all to listen, and, if needful, to pay for the pleasure of hearing. Therefore, with regard to the song before us, we shall only say—It is John Barnett's.

With Verdure Clad. From Haydn's Creation. Arranged for the Piano by BRINLEY RICHARDS.

THE greatest thing that can be said of a transcription is that it faithfully adheres to the original. This is the case with the work before us. Mr. Richards has shown a reverential regard for Haydn's text, and has limited his own work exclusively to adapting the song for pianoforte performance. Herein is a merit all can appreciate.

Lohengrin. The Wedding music from Wagner's opera, arranged for the pianoforte by HAROLD THOMAS.

IN this transcription, a portion of the procession music, the Bridal Chorus, and the spirited introduction to the Wedding Act, are welded together in a manner which certainly avoids great difficulties without much loss of effect.

ENOCH & SONS.

Royal March. Composed for the State visit of the Shah of Persia to the Royal Italian Opera. Arranged for the pianoforte by A. VIANESI.

THIS bright and characteristic effusion will be welcome just now, because apropos of the lion of the hour. But it has an interest of its own—such interest as springs from novelty of theme and well-considered effect. The Persian Royal March should be on every pianoforte.

METHVEN, SIMPSON, & Co.

Fair fa' the gloamin'. Song for Contralto. Melody and Words by J. B. Arranged by W. W. WATSON.

A SIMPLE, pretty melody, simply arranged, and only needing to be simply sung to make a good effect. Contraltos look at it.

ROME.—A new theatre, the Teatro Minerva, is to be opened in October.

"OBSERVATIONS ON THE HUMAN VOICE."

BY MANUEL GARCIA, ESQ.

Communicated by DR. SHARPEY, *Sec. R. S.

MANNER IN WHICH THE SOUNDS ARE FORMED.

As we have just said, and what we have seen proves it, the inferior ligaments, at the bottom of the larynx, form exclusively the voice, whatever may be its register or its intensity; for they alone vibrate at the bottom of the larynx.† But by virtue of what principle is the voice formed? It seems to me that the answer to this question can be but this: the voice is formed in one unique manner—by the compressions and expansions of the air, or the successive and regular explosions which it produces in passing through the glottis.

The ligaments of the glottis, situate about the mean level of the upper border of the cricoid, close the passage and present a resistance to the air. As soon as the air has accumulated sufficiently it parts these folds and produces an explosion. But, at the same instant, by virtue of their elasticity, and the pressure from below being relieved, they meet again to give rise to a fresh explosion. A series of these compressions and expansions, or of explosions, occasioned by the expansive force of the air and the reaction of the glottis, produces the voice.

This theory, though now generally admitted for reeds, and undoubtedly evident in the liquid vein, the tooth-wheel of Savart, the syrène of the Baron Cagnard Latour, &c., has not to my knowledge been yet applied to the glottis‡ If we consider that the lips of this aperture, taken separately, can give no kind of sound, however we may try to make them speak, we must admit that the sounds which they give forth by their mutual action, are only owing to the explosions of the air produced by their strokes.‖ It is not necessary, in order to obtain the explosion of sound, that the glottis should be perfectly closed each time after its opening; it suffices that it should oppose an obstacle to the air capable of developing its elasticity. In this case the rushing of the air is heard accompanying the sounds, and they take a veiled, and sometimes an extremely muffled character—an observation which we have already presented to the reader's notice in speaking of the falsetto.

CONJECTURES ON THE FORMATION OF THE DIFFERENT REGISTERS.

As the entire system of vibrations arises solely from the inferior ligaments, it is evident that the cause of the different tones called registers, must be sought for in the muscles which set these ligaments in motion; and that the other parts of the larynx must be considered only as apparatus for strengthening the sounds obtained, and for modifying their quality. In our efforts to discover the more intimate processes of the vocal organs which produce the sounds, we shall recur at once to the observations already mentioned, to some anatomical remarks which we are going to make, and to the sensations which we feel in the organ itself whilst it is producing sounds.

If we detach one of the halves of the thyroid cartilage, we shall see a large muscular surface of oblique fibres, which fills all the space between the arytenoid and thyroid cartilages. At its upper end is to be seen the muscle corresponding to the superior vocal ligaments, and which sometimes extends to the notch in the thyroid. After detaching this generally frail muscle, all the fibres constituting this muscular surface seem to start from two

* From the "Proceedings of the Royal Society of London," Vol. VII., 1856, Meeting of May 24, 1855. Page 399 to 410.

† We gladly acknowledge that this most important fact has been already announced by J. Müller, although we have our objections to the theory which accompanies it.—Handbuch der Physiologie des Menschen.

‡ I find that Dr. Müller hints at the possibility of the voice being thus formed, but only to attack and reject the notion.—Ibid.

‖ Many controversies have arisen respecting the sounds sometimes emitted by animals after the section of the superior and recurrent laryngeal nerves; sounds which have been perhaps occasioned by the struggling of the animal, causing a swelling of the neck and a mechanical contact of the vocal ligaments. However, without doubt, after the section of these nerves, voice, as a voluntary act, can no longer take place.

Digitized by Google

opposite centres, viz., the anterior surface of the arytenoid, and the re-entering angle of the thyroid. These centres, occupying the extremities of a diagonal line, send their fibres towards each other in parallel lines. Those which start from the anterior face of the arytenoid descend obliquely; the most external ones go to the cricoid, whose posterior half they cover at the side; the most internal ones descend to the vocal membrane,* which they cover entirely. The fibres which terminate at the membrane become longer as they become more internal. Those which start from the re-entering angle of the thyroid re-ascend obliquely to the summit of the arytenoid, then diverge in order to form the sides of the ventricles, and then disappear in the aryteno-epiglottidean folds, and even the under surface of the epiglottis. If we cut it away in successive layers, proceeding from the outside to the in, we reach a thick bundle of fibres, perfectly horizontal, which line the outer aspect of the vocal ligament, and which go from the anterior apophyses of the arytenoid to the re-entering angle of the thyroid.†

This bundle has its posterior half-covered by the lateral crico-arytenoid muscle, and its anterior half by the diverging fibres which start from the thyroid. If we cut away the horizontal bundle in successive layers, we see that the fibres are not all of the same length; the most external fibres are the longest, and the succeeding ones get gradually shorter as they become more internal; but they all originate in the anterior cavity of the arytenoid, and the muscle is inserted in the manner above explained throughout the whole length of the vocal ligaments, the thyro-arytenoid portion of it excepted. As the fibres all begin from the arytenoid, and terminate successively at more distant points of the membrane, we see that the muscle is thicker behind than before.

Thus the vocal ligament, and the membrane which depends from it, the sole sources of all vocal sounds, are under the direct action of the fibres, which come from the anterior cavity of the arytenoid; the ligament under the action of the horizontal bundle, the membrane under that of the oblique fibres. The long horizontal fibres, extending from one cartilage to the other, are placed at the exterior of the short horizontal fibres, and at the interior of the oblique fibres. The diverging fibres which start from the thyroid, acting only on the superior vocal ligaments and the folds, seem to influence by their contractions only the quality and volume of the voice.

The remarkable arrangement of the fibres which we have just examined enables us to explain a fundamental fact—the elevation of the voice. The fibres of the horizontal bundle being placed over each other, in layers—one covering the other, and getting gradually longer and longer, as they become more external—extend their action to the more anterior parts of the edges of the glottis. This progressive action from the back to the front encroaches gradually on the length of the vibrating portion of the ligament, and likewise increases its tension, and its faculty of accelerating its pulsations.

Another portion of the thyro-arytenoid muscle at the same time stretches and raises the vocal membrane more and more, causing a lesser depth of the ligaments to be in contact in proportion as the sounds become higher, and thus assists by increasing the mobility of the ligaments.

We shall see in a few moments that the rotary movement, which the external fibres of the lateral crico-arytenoid muscles give to the arytenoid, by making the vocal membrane deeper, partly counteracts the above effect, and produces the chest-register.

The crico-thyroid muscle, on the contrary, is a powerful auxiliary in the elevation of the voice. This muscle, which at the same time causes the thyroid to come forwards and downwards, gives rise to a mechanical tension, not only in the vocal ligament but even in the whole vocal membrane. The meeting of the thyroid and cricoid cartilages, which we can feel by the touch, becomes especially marked when the inter-ligamentous glottis alone produces the sounds, which takes place as we have seen at the notes do 3, ré 3,  in the chest-register, and an octave above for that of the head; with this difference, however, that for the latter a more vigorous and complete connexion is necessary.

Let us now see what we may learn from the sensations we feel in the vocal organ. When we produce a chest-note, the least attention enables us to distinguish a "pinching" at the posterior part of the glottis, which becomes more vigorous as the notes ascend. This pinching seems to be formed by extension of the depth of the touching surfaces, and may become very painful; whilst the notes of falsetto, when higher than chest ones, give comparatively great relief to this part, and the surfaces in contact seem to have become thinner.

If we combine these sensations with the different remarks which have been furnished to us by the examination of the muscles, we can fix the particular mechanism of each register.

(To be continued.)

* We thus designate that part of the membrane which goes from the bottom of the vocal ligament to the edge of the cricoid.

† Another portion of the thyro-arytenoid muscle.

PERSIAN MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Daily News.")

SIR,—In reference to your remarks respecting Persian music, I beg to refer you to a volume of the Popular Poetry of Persia, by Chodzko, published for the Oriental Society, and obtainable in the library of the British Museum. At the end of this volume—containing popular songs of the Persians, Kalmucks, Astrakans, Tartars, Ghilanfs, and others—are a few—less than a dozen—Persian melodies, some of which are quite in accordance with our eight-bar rhythm, while others are quite irregular in this respect. They also show poverty rather than richness of melody: and, until other genuine collections are produced, your remark that there is a paucity of Persian music holds good.—Yours truly,

THE HEART'S MISGIVINGS.*

I.

Ronald, tell thou the reason why
I see this coldness in thine eye!
Once it shone with radiant light
When I chanced to come in sight;
Now it doth cold and lifeless seem,
As thou wert in a waking dream.
Say, dost sight of me give pain?
Or art thou th' accepted swain
Of maid with form more fair than mine,
And to be near her dost thou pine?
The thought mak'st bitter tears to flow,
My heart's misgivings say 'tis so!

II.

Once thou loved with me to saunter
In yon pleasaunce, and to wander
Near the brook, and through the grove,
Passionately tell thy love:
Now, for long hours I hear no sound
Escape thy lips; thy hawk and hound
Alone seem to interest thee.
Dost thou, then, no more love me?
Have I no charms to please thee left?
Of all my worth am I bereft?
Am I, then, in thy mind so low?
My heart's misgivings say 'tis so!

III.

Take from these plants this summer sun
Ere yet to bud they have begun,
From the bee, her luscious bait,
Or the ring-dove from her mate;
Take from the lark its bright blue sky,
And soon they all will droop and die.
Spurn from thee this loving heart,
Let it of thine have no part,
Till, broken, in the dust it lies,
Then thou'lt see how it pines and dies;
Nought would remain for it but woe,
It's own misgivings tell it so!

WAIFS.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Saturday, an action was tried, in which Mr. Littleton, a member of the firm of Messrs. Novello, music publishers, sought to recover damages from M. Gounod, the well-known composer, for libel. The observations complained of were contained in a letter written by the defendant in a journal devoted almost exclusively to musical subjects. It was admitted that the words were technically libellous, but M. Gounod declined to apologise, contending that he was justified in what he had said. The jury found a verdict for 40s., and the judge certified for costs.

The report of the Crystal Palace company informs us that the next Triennial Handel Festival will be held in 1874. During the 19 years since the opening, on June 10, 1854, the Palace has been visited by more than 33,000,000 persons. The directors state, with regard to the precautions taken since the fire at the Crystal Palace in 1866 against any future event of the kind, that the large reservoir (two acres in area) is distant only 240 feet from the main building, that the tanks and cisterns, including those on the high towers, are kept constantly full, and that the mains which pervade the building are always charged night and day.

Mdme. Billinie Porter was the vocalist at several of the Exhibition Concerts, Albert Hall, this week.

The French Opera House, in New Orleans, which cost $200,000, was recently sold at auction for $45,000.

The fête at the Crystal Palace, in aid of the sufferers by fire at the Alexandra Palace, took place on Monday last.

The expressed intention of Rubinstein is to play no more in public, but to devote the remainder of his life to composition.

Mr. Brinley Richards has a short sacred Cantata in hand, which will be produced at the Eisteddfod, to be held at Mold, in August next.

Mdlle. Sangalli, who was première danseuse at the Alexandra Palace, has been recalled to Paris by M. Halanzier, Director of the French Operahouse.

It is proposed to publish a life of the late Rev. Dr. Whewell, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, with selections from his Correspondence and Remains.

The actor, Ligier, in dying, bequeathed a portrait of himself, in oil, to the Théâtre Français. This work has been placed in the green-room of the theatre.

Among the novelties in Vienna at this moment are concerts given by an orchestra of thirty-three females. Most of these are young and of prepossessing appearance, and many really talented.

M. Daldevez has been definitively appointed conductor of the orchestra at the Grand Opéra, Paris. He is the author of a work entitled Curiosities Musicales, Notes, Analyses, giving particulars concerning Mozart, Beethoven, and Spohr.

Messrs. Bentley and Son will publish, next autumn, the autobiography of Mr. H. F. Chorley. As Mr. Chorley did not live to complete the work, it has been continued by his literary executor, Mr. Hewlett, from Mr. Chorley's papers.

Every person who bought a half-fare ticket for the Cincinnati festival was obliged to buy a ticket for one concert at least, which was attached to the railroad ticket. This of course prevented many making the festival an occasion for a cheap trip to the city.

Behind the scenes: First singer—"I cannot understand how it comes, I have bought six bouquets and got only five." "Easily explained," said the other, "I bought six for myself too, but I got seven. May be yours is among them." The stage is indeed a sham world.

Rubinstein, playing in Albany, stopped in the middle of a piece; remarking, "What do the stupid people mean by their everlasting running about? It is quite impossible to play." He then rose, bowed and left the platform, to which he refused to return to play.

The widow of Adolphe Adam has given the music and manuscripts belonging to her deceased husband to the library of the Conservatoire de Musique. In this collection, in thirty-six volumes, are several of the principal scores of the author of the Postillon de Longjumeau.

The training classes of the Board of Education, Dublin, gave their usual concert at the end of their course, on Saturday, 14th June, when selections from Mendelssohn's Odessus at Colonos and Schumann's Paradise and the Peri were given. Professor Glover conducted.

The Musical Standard states that the Ballet des Chevaliers, a comparatively unknown work by Beethoven, is about to be printed for the first time. The work is mentioned by Nohl in his biography, and consists of eight movements. An arrangement for the piano is to be published at Paris.

Signor Verdi has informed the municipal authorities of Milan of his intention to write a funeral mass in honour of Alessandro Manzoni, to be performed on the first anniversary of the poet's death.

No complimentary tickets were given out to the festival in Cincinnati. The city press received season tickets, while editors and reporters from elsewhere had to make daily application for their allowance.

The lawsuit between the members of the German band which played at Boston, and the leader Saro, has been at last decided. The leader claimed for himself six times as much as was given to any of the band. To this the members demurred, and Saro is allowed but four times as much as a member, which is quite enough.

A projected wedding is much talked of in literary circles. The bridegroom is Joaquin Miller, the Californian poet and author of the "Songs of the Sierras," and the bride, Miss Hardy, the novelist, and daughter of Sir Thomas Duffus and Lady Hardy. Miss Hardy is not only one of the most talented, but one of the prettiest girls in London.—Porcupine.

Invitations were extensively issued for an amateur Italian opera entertainment at the Union League Theatre, New York, on the 22nd ult., but no names of singers were given. Full dress was requested, and an immense assemblage arrived in carriages, much to the astonishment of the janitor. A notice was finally posted at the door that the entertainment would be given at Robinson Hall. An adjournment of the fashionables took place there, but they were greeted by a placard with "The amateur opera postponed in consequence of the Modoc war."

Scene: Meeting of the faculty of a conservatory. Some committees are reporting, and try to display much profound learning. One of these demanded that new teachers should be engaged, making the astounding and very profound remark that the study of the crescendo alone required a teacher's full time. The Director listened very calmly to all their talk, and at last said: "I must agree with the speaker, and, to carry out his system, we must, for next session, engage major and minor professors." This remark, of course, settled our crescendo professor.

The ringing of Easter bells has lately led to troubles in Portsmouth, N. H. A law of the City forbids the ringing of bells before sunrise, on all days except the fourth of July—unless it be in case of fire. The rector of the Episcopal Church, thinking he owed allegiance first to the time-honoured ways, gave orders that his sexton should ring the bells in spite of all laws. The sexton wisely declined, feeling sure that the law has a strong arm yet in this country, so the pastor sent his son, who rang in Easter morning quite lustily, bringing hundreds of people from their couches, and stirring up a fire of indignation, which will likely burn him out of his office. So much for an untimely ringing of bells.

One, who had nothing else to do, wished to find out how much time is spent in a concert in performances, and how much in resting. He, therefore, timed the concert as follows: Overture, 7 minutes; Gipsy dance, from the Huguenots, 4 minutes; Waltz, by Strauss, 6 minutes; Air, from Figaro, by Mozart, 4 minutes; Overture to Stradella, 7 minutes; Pot-pourri, from Traviata, 7 minutes—Intermission—Overture to Zampa, 6 minutes; Quadrille, by Strauss, 7 minutes; Song, by Abt, 5 minutes; a Waltz, 5 minutes; Pot-pourri, from Tell, 7 minutes; Polka, 4 minutes—Total, 69 minutes. The concert lasted 4½ hours or 270 minutes, of which 69 were spent in playing, while 201 minutes were devoted to resting.

A short time since, a number of amateur musicians in a town of western Pennsylvania made an effort to organize an orchestra. They were successful in procuring all the performers they desired except a clarionet player. One of the number finally volunteered to take up the instrument and learn it. He had no clarionet, but hearing that he could probably borrow one from a young man in town, who was thought to own one, he met him on the street one day, and accosted him with "How are you, Brown? I heard you had a clarionet." The fellow looked at him in utter amazement, having, probably, never heard of such a thing before, and stammered out, "Well, I—I—was sick about two weeks ago, but I don't think I had that."

Mr. Mapleson, of Her Majesty's Opera, at Drury Lane, who has a specialty for discovering tenors, has hit upon the "happy thought" of allowing all unknown and ambitious vocalists to try their voices on Tuesday afternoons on the stage of Drury Lane, a pianist being on the spot to accompany the vocal efforts of the ambitious Marios, Grisis, Tamburinis, Lablaches, and Albonis, as yet unheard. I was present at one of these après midi rehearsals, the other day, and I heard a young Englishman singing a tenor air in Italian with an amount of fervour, taste, and richness of voice which aroused even Mr. Mapleson from his managerial stolidity,—always requisite on such occasions. I shall not be surprised if Mr. Mapleson's novel experiment is some day rewarded by the discovery of an operatic Koh-i-noor which will make his fortune, and give us once more that long hoped for rara avis—a real successor to Mario and Giuglini.—Porcupine.

Speaking of a performance of Don Pasquale at Sarzana, the Lunigiana says:—

"The tenor, Signor Giorgio Bentami, sustained the part of Ernesto most exquisitely. He was tumultuously and continuously applauded, and repeatedly called on. At the general request, he obligingly repeated the serenade ('Com' è gentil'). This gentleman sings with precision and soul; his extensive, silvery, and sympathetic voice is well adapted to music of a delicate kind, like that of Don Pasquale, in fact, so much is this the case, that we may say the opera appears to be expressly written for him. With such vocal gifts, such zeal, and such love for the divine art of Euterpe, his career (we do not hesitate asserting) will be a most brilliant one."

The Trovatore remarks, in reference to the same artist:—

"Signor Bentami, the eminent tenor, obtained a brilliant success, at Sarzana, in Don Pasquale. He was greatly applauded in all his pieces, and encored in the serenade. He was, also, recalled several times."

The Romans were very fond of roses. Cleopatra received Anthony at one of her banquets in an apartment covered with rose leaves to a considerable depth; and Anthony, when dying, requested roses to be strewed on his grave. Roman generals, who achieved remarkable victories, had roses sculptured on their shields. Rose-water was the favourite perfume of the Roman ladies, and the most luxurious even used it in their baths. In the East, or, indeed, all over the world, the rose has been a favourite with poets. The Turks believe that roses sprang from the perspiration of Mahomet; for which reason they never tread on a rose leaf, nor suffer one to lie on the ground; they also sculpture the rose on the tombs of unmarried females. The red and white rose gave their name to the "War of the Roses," between the contending houses of York and Lancaster, in English history. The same uses of the rose have everywhere descended to our own times. The term sub rosâ (under the rose) is universally proverbial, and, it is said, arose from one of the Popes having ordered consecrated roses to be placed over the confessionals of Rome, to denote secrecy. Roses were first planted in England in 1622.

Royal Gallery of Illustration.—Last week, in the little theatre which has now so long and favourably been known as the home of light comedy, character sketches, satiric touches, and pleasant song, under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, a matinée was given, of which a part was quite new and a part quite old, yet cheerful to hear and lively to see. The new part, under the name of Dora's Dream, recites in dialogue and song the loves of Dora Leslie (Fanny Holland) who dreams only of poets, and Fred Fencourt (Mr. Arthur Cecil), her cousin, who is a stockbroker. Many pleasant passages at arms, of the arrow kind, have taken place before Dora gives up her poetic fancies; but, in the end, she resigns her Tennysons, her Brownings, her Rosettis, her Morrises, and the whole of the genus irritabile for the jovial stockbroker, and they wed with every prospect of mutual happiness. The sketch has been adapted from the French by Mr. Arthur Cecil, and the music arranged by Mr. Alfred Cellier. It was well received by a crowded house. It need scarcely be said that Mr. Corney Grain's Musical Sketch, so full of fun, frolic, and folâtrerie, kept the audience in a state of continuous laughter; and the bright little piece which followed—Charity Begins at Home—did not allow it to flag much till the curtain fell.

A nice little civil war is at present raging in the dramatic and operatic circles of the metropolis in connection with a social club called "The Bohemians," which is located in Grafton Street, Bond Street. This club was established for the purpose of bringing into friendly union the aristocratic and wealthy patrons of the theatres and opera-nouses and the chief dramatic and vocal artists of the day. The idea was a very good one, but so far it has been a failure. "The Bohemians" hold their meetings on Sunday evenings, and have music and conversation, but as yet the chief musical artists have never met their sisters of the English stage, and the actors refuse all invitations. The result is a deal of ill-feeling; and, for interested reasons, many of the "swell" "Bohemians" have spread reports that the foreign artists will not meet English actresses. Now, the real facts of the case are simply these. Up to the present time, the only English "actresses" who have appeared at "The Bohemians" have been the Totties, Tillies, Topsies, Mauds, and other "ballet ladies," arriving in the broughams and drags of the "golden youth" who haunt the coulisses and stage-doors of the various theatres. As a matter of course, ladies like Mdlle. Tietjens and Miss Madge Robertson will not meet in private the "pets" whose photographs figure in all the shop-windows, and this circumstance has been taken advantage of by the friends and admirers of the "pets" to sow discord between the foreign and native artists of established position and reputation. The result of this triangular squabble will either lead to the break up of "The Bohemians" or the establishment of a club where lady artists can meet one another without scandal and without embarrassment.—Porcupine.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

MUSICAL REMINISCENCES OF TRAVEL.*

By W. Langhans.

When, at the end of April, I set out southwards, in order to escape from a northern winter, which seemed as though it would never end, nothing was more distant from my mind than any idea of musical enjoyment, the more especially as, during the course of the season, our good town of Berlin had lavished upon me an unexampled profusion of such enjoyment. But—naturam furca expellas—I was no sooner at Geneva, where I could breathe for the first time, than I broke my vow of musical abstinence, and, though perfectly aware I was in Switzerland, the most unmusical country in the world, directed my steps instinctively in the direction of the Theatre, where Halévy's Charles VI. was announced in the bills of the evening.

Yes, Switzerland is an unmusical country par excellence; I cannot retract the assertion! It is only where the Rhine, after long youthful blustering, has tamed down and stretches its huge arc towards the north, where an ancient and solid bridge establishes the most intimate connection with the land of Baden; and where, upon the other side, songful Alsatia, complacently displays her broad expanse—it is only at Basle that Music has reason to rejoice at its lot, for there it is certainly cultivated in a manner which many of our musical centres in Germany might take as a model. The nearer, however, we approach the mountains, and the more grandly Nature is unfolded before us, the more exclusively are the thoughts of the inhabitants directed to the Practical, and the slighter is the need experienced of beauty, a need which Mother Nature has undertaken in so liberal a fashion to satisfy. Look at Geneva, for instance, where, in addition to everything else, the breath of a bigoted Protestantism suffocates in their very germs the impulses of joyous art-development, and a thoroughly French system of culture has placed its seal upon public as well as private life. I was not, therefore, at all astonished to find the performance of Charles VI. worthy only of a French provincial town of the third or fourth class. Singers, chorus, orchestra, and scenery, could not really have been more mediocre in Macon or Besançon, but the public were below even that level. It was only in one scene that a little life was infused into the sleepy assembly, namely, at the well-known line:—

"Jamais en France l'Anglais ne règnera!"

which, first given by the tenor, and then repeated by the soprano, is finally bellowed out by the chorus; three verses each time, which makes, according to Cocker, nine repetitions. It was clear to me that the opera, utterly unknown among us, owes its long life in France exclusively to this chorus; and, as I saw even the phlegmatic Genevese take fire at the above passage, I could picture vividly to myself the scene at Dijon, where, during the Prussian occupation, the same chorus, only with the variation, was sung amid frantic jubilation. I cannot recollect whether our soldiers smiled at the intellectual joke, or whether they turned "nasty;" for my part, I would not, under the circumstances, begrudge the French any amusement of this description, and I have no doubt that Charles VI. will frequently render similar service, if the French continue in the path they have pursued since 1870.

On the following day, I allowed myself to be hurried through the black abyss of the Mont Cenis tunnel to the country which Mephistophiles might have named "das Land des Weins und der Gesänge" ("The Land of Wine and Song,") with quite as much justice as he denominated Spain so, if not with more. Why does he mention wine first? Certainly as a result of the same train of thought which caused me to designate the soil of Switzerland as unmusical. Yes, a wine-producing country is, without doubt, especially favourable to the development of song, and, therefore, I may well be allowed, without sinning against logic, to open my account of music in Turin by a eulogy on the Piedmontese wines, above all the sort called Barolo, which I earnestly beseech my readers not to confound with the inklike fluid which fills travellers in the Venetian territory with insurmountable but just disgust. Barolo, on the contrary, is a fairy drink, as delicate in taste as beneficial to health, and which, moreover, when arrived at its destination, possesses the quality of causing the world to appear in a far more pleasant light than before. Though, too, it may not have had the effect of making me behold "Helena in jedem Weibe," I am assuredly indebted to it for a portion of the pleasure afforded me by Apolloni's opera, L'Ebreo, which followed my dinner.

Again I had to do with neither first-class artists nor a first-class audience (for, as we all know, the great operahouses of Italy restrict their efforts to Carnival time). The quarter in which the temple of the Muses was established was not more elegant than the spectators which filled it, and yet what a difference to Geneva! What rapidity of comprehension this side the float; what admirable talent and self-devotion on the other! The last quality I feel inclined to characterise as absolutely indispensable to any artist, male or female, coming out at Turin, for I never in any place met with a more merciless public. Both the Prima Donna and the Primo Uomo were born artists, admirably trained, liberally gifted by Nature, and plainly needing only experience to be ranked among the best; the audience, however, did not seem to think much of them. The first act went off without any encouragement, but when, at the commencement of the second, the Prima Donna, who had till then sung as clearly as a bell, was unfortunate enough to bring out a difficult interval a trifle too low, and with a somewhat compressed tone, there arose among the audience a mixed storm of howling, whistling, laughing, and ironical calls, that would have caused the heart of a German singer to sink into her shoes; and when, on the repetition of the passage, the lady did not succeed in correcting her fault, her stern judges, on their side, would not forego their right of repeating the scene, only more violently. The same thing happened to the tenor when—for the only time the whole evening—he failed, and supported a high chest C by a slight rocking on his knees. This was the signal for a truly infernal hubbub, in which, besides the expressions of opinion already enumerated, you might have plainly distinguished the cries of the most dissimilar animals. I oscillated between indignation and an irresistible irritation of the risible muscles, but the two victims of this musical folks'-justice did not allow themselves to be disturbed in the least by the tempest. On the contrary, they sang and played with redoubled zeal, and, in the finale of the same act—a perfect masterpiece, by the way, of Italian operatic style, with which, as well as with the whole opera, I should be sincerely glad for the German public to be acquainted—were rewarded by enthusiastic applause and a triple recall, for their perseverance and artistic fidelity. Hereupon, I became reconciled with the Turin public, and actually caught myself wishing that a portion at least of such critical pugnacity could fall to the lot of our own public; the numerous bad habits under which dramatic singers labour among us could not possibly flourish with their present well-known luxuriousness, were they crushed in the germ, as at Turin, by spontaneous measures of repression.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

Karlsbad (Bohemia).—The concerts of our excellent Cur-Orchestra, under the distinguished leadership of music-director A. Labitzky, are this year one of the chief attractions of this charming watering-place. The programmes, not too long, are always interesting, and are judiciously framed to suit the demand of every legitimate taste. Amongst the solo players, Fräulein Anna Dubery, the talented harpist, and kammer virtuoso of H. S. H. the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, is, as in previous years, a particular favourite. In the Curhaus concert of June the 4th, she had great success in a romance of Schulhoff's, arranged for harp and horn, the latter being capitally played by Herr J. Behr. By special desire she played also Oberthür's effective harp solo, "Clouds and sunshine," with immense success. In the same concert, also a selection from V. Wallace's tuneful opera, Lurline, was performed amidst great applause. At the concert of the 9th, Fräulein Dubery played a duo for harp and clarionet by Venzl, the clarionet part being played by Herr E. Troll, who has a beautiful tone and plays with great taste. At the same concert Fräulein Dubery also played Oberthür's "Elegie" (Una lagrima sulla tomba di Parish-Alvars), producing great effect with this highly interesting composition. The overture at this concert was Weber's Preciosa.

Erfurt.—A successful performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul was lately given by the members of Soller's Musical Union, under the direction of Herr Adolf Golde.

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

By Joseph Seiler.

Thus, among other marks of the esteem in which Meyer was held may be stated the fact that, in the year 1747, he was summoned by Prince Abbot Cœlestin to St. Gallen, for the purpose of giving instruction to the musical establishment there. He remained several months, during which he finished his Opus 1, the 40 songs by Metastasio already mentioned as set by him in the style of Durante and Pergolese. They were published by Joseph Samm, who had them printed at the Prince's printing office.

In the middle of October the same year, Meyer was named inspector of the Arsenal in his native town.

In May 1748, he was betrothed to Eva Margaritha Pfyffers von Altishofen, daughter of a Swiss captain of the Guard in Vienna. "But," says our Chronicle, "on account of all kinds of intrigues, the parents on both sides were by ear-whisperings placed in an embarrassing position, as if the love between the young betrothed couple had begun to change its ardour into coldness, and had entirely died out in the month of August, 1750, so that both parties put an end to the acquaintance in a perfectly friendly manner, and with all the honour with which they had cultivated it, when it was commenced—anno 1748."

Whatever may have been the "ear-whisperings" here mentioned, the whole business appears to have produced a deep impression upon Meyer von Schauensee, as his relatives and friends considered it requisite that he should travel for the benefit of his health, and prevailed upon him to set out in the course of the same year. "It happened," says the Chronicle, "that on the return journey, as he passed through Zurich, there was, on the very same day, a public concert held, being the first of a series of concerts got up by some great amateurs of music, and to take place once a week at the celebrated Music Collegio. He proceeded, therefore, to the music-hall, which was fitted up in an admirable and costly manner. He flattered himself that he should be able to listen incognito to the magnificent musique, but he was immediately recognised by some gentlemen of the town, who, without more ado, welcomed him as Councillor and Arsenal Inspector of Lucerne, and earnestly begged him: To do the respectable auditorio (among whom was also the Dutch Minister, Msr. de Calmette) the especial favour of letting them hear his far-famed art. After some complimentary excuses, he allowed himself to be persuaded, and mounted the raised orchestra, on which the Prince's piano was carried up by two men. On this he performed in a masterly style one of his rare pianoforte concertos accompanied by the usual instrumental musique,† and amid a general and almost tempestuous clapping of hands."

Meanwhile, in the year 1749, Meyer had composed, and himself conducted, his most important sacred work, the grand Mass with three Choruses for the festival of St. Michael at Münster. Unfortunately, this splendid creation, written in imitation of Orazio Benevoli's compositions with several choruses, for 26 distinct parts, has never been printed. Yet it deserved better than any other of Meyer's productions to be known at the present day. It far surpasses in melody the work of the Berliner, Tasch, which sprang from a similar cause, but not from such love and enthusiastic faith, while it is perfectly equal in the management of the parts and profound contrapuntal combinations.

In 1751, Meyer was appointed to the office of "Sest-und-Reis-Waag-Herren," then one of the most lucrative offices in Lucerne. But this appointment was the last worldly mark of consideration bestowed on him, for, in the year 1752, he resolved a second time to enter the Church, and, despite all opposition on the part of his relatives, carried out his resolution forthwith. Resigning his posts of honour and his rights as an eldest son, he entered the noble foundation, already several times mentioned, of St Leodegar, on the 18th March, 1752. He soon became honorary chaplain, organist, musical director, etc. He was also, "in the space of three weeks, consecrated a priest by his Excellency Monsignor Acciajuolo, Nuntio Apostolico. Some weeks later, the said Nuntio appointed him Apostolic Pro-Notary."

The narrative concerning the life and doings of this highly gifted man does not unfortunately extend beyond the period of his entering the Church. That, however, he never proved unfaithful to art, but on the contrary—though in greater retirement—always exerted himself in its cause, is testified by his works, which extend to the year 1764, when he published the last, the Organ Concerto.

Facts relating to the latter years of one who did such honour to art and to his native land are probably to be found at Lucerne, Einsiedeln, St. Gallen, and Augsburg (the place where most of his works were published). It would be extremely gratifying if those who came across such facts would make them generally known, and I now beg them very earnestly to do so.

If, finally, I were now called on to state in a few words what I think of Schauensee's importance as regards art—so far as it is possible for me to come to a decision from the opinion of his contemporaries and from the repeated examination of some of his principal works—I should, in reference to and in connection with the introduction to these lines, say: Meyer von Schauensee was a persistent, valiant, and indefatigable labourer in the vineyard.

If it did not fall to his lot to discover new paths of his own, he smoothed the difficulties in the way of such a consummation for those who came after him, and were greater than he was.

And when, at the end of his day's labour he received his penny, he did not look with an evil eye on other, and younger men who—perhaps at the last hour—overtook and cast him in the shade.

The Lord of the vineyard, however, knows all he has summoned and all he has chosen. He alone is aware of their worth. He alone is aware why he hired them.

And when night was approaching and the day had already declined, the Lord came and gave each a penny—no matter at how much higher a price many among the labourers had valued themselves.

But Meyer's motto, as was to be seen on all his manuscripts and music books, was the words of the royal singer: "Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed Tuo nomini da gloriam."—Psalm cxiii. v. 9.

And a new time came and a marvellously resplendent triple constellation glowed with the intensity of Sirius in the firmament of art: Gluck, Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart! Before the all-powerful stream of primitive light sent forth from that constellation Meyer's mildly shining star was doomed to pale and set.

His name—has died away.

Meyer's compositions published down to the year 1764 are:—

Opus I.—De Femine bono, etc. (40 airs for soprano and alt.)
Opus II.—Obeliscus Musicus (16 Offertories, Motets, etc.) 1752.
Opus III.—Ecclesia Triumphans (Te Deum, Tantum ergo, etc.) 1753.
Opus IV.—Pontificale Romano-Constantiense (Masses). 1756.
Opus V.—Cantica Doctoris (Maria Antiphones). 1756.
Opus VI.—Pantheon Musicum (Organ Concertos). 1757.
Opus VII.—Phœbus, sive Apollo musicus (Vespers, etc). 1757.
Opus VIII.—Tabellarius musicus (Symphonies for 4 Voices). 1757.

He left in manuscript twenty other important sacred works, including the Michael Mass with three Choruses, Te Deum, Requiem, Litanies, &c.

Meyer composed for the stage:—

1. Il Trionfo della Gloria. 1742.
2. Il Palladio conservato. 1743.
3. Applausi festosi della Sardegna. 1744.
4. Hortus conclusus, Eine dem hohen Liede nachgebildete Kantate. 1745.
5. Die Parnassische Gesellschaft, deutsche Operette. 1746.
6. Musikalisches Fried- und Freudenfest, eine Götteroper. 1751.
7. Brutus, a tragic opera. 1753.
8. Der Geldbeutel des Geizigen. A farce with songs. 1754.

Of these dramatic works, which—with the exception of 7 and 8—were all occasional compositions, only the librettos were published—the first three at Cagliari, and the others at Lucerne. No pianoforte arrangements or scores of any of these cantatas, musical pieces, and operas, were published.

Some other sacred compositions by Meyer were published without Opus number at Augsburg and Nuremberg. On the last: Concerti d'Organo, 1764, the composer is styled: "Oberkapellmeister von Luzern" ("Chief Chapelmaster of Lucerne").

REPORTS ON DISEASES OF THE THROAT.

(From the "Medical Press and Circular.")

"OBSERVATIONS ON THE HUMAN VOICE."

BY MANUEL GARCIA, ESQ.

Communicated by DR. SHARPEY, *Sec. R. S.

CHEST REGISTER.

In fact, when the arytenoid muscles have brought in contact the arytenoid cartilages, and closed the glottis, the voice may take two very different characters; nay, more, it will be produced in pitches widely apart from one another, and will give forth the chest or falsetto registers, according as the fibres of the thyro-arytenoid attached to the vocal membrane are active or not. By the action of these fibres, as we have seen, this muscle raises the vocal membrane, and makes its apposable part thinner; whereas the lateral crico-arytenoid gives a rotatory movement to the cartilage, which brings the apophyses into deep contact. This deep contact, which continues even after the apophyses no longer partake in the vibrations, gives a deep tension to the membranes, increases the depth of their contact † and, as a necessary consequence, augments the resistance they present to the air. It is to the extent of this resistance that we attribute the formation of the chest-register, so distinct by its particular amplitude. To it we attribute also the slowness of the beats of the glottis, and the consequent low pitch of the sounds—a pitch which, even in the highest tenor voices, is at least an octave lower than the head notes of ordinary soprani.

REGISTER OF FALSETTO.

When, on the contrary, the external fibres of the lateral crico-arytenoid muscle remain inactive, we produce the falsetto. The lips of the glottis, stretched by the horizontal bundle of the thyro-arytenoid, come in contact by their edge alone, formed at once by the ligament and the apophyses, and offer little resistance to the air. Hence arises the great loss of this agent, and the general weakness of the sounds produced here.

But as soon as we reach the sound $\frac{do,}{4}$ the beats are produced by the ligaments exclusively, and we have attained the head-register. It is certain, as we may deduce from the movement of the ligaments, that then the vocal membrane is raised by the action of the fibres of the thyro-arytenoid muscle, and its surface is diminished to an edge; but we think that the external fibres of the lateral crico-arytenoid, which would prevent this movement, remain inactive. Then also the very decided tension, which the crico-thyroid muscle effects on the vocal tendons, and which accelerates their movements, takes place.

During the chest register, therefore, the vocal ligaments are stretched, and are in contact to an extent corresponding with the depth of the anterior apophyses of the arytenoid, whilst in the falsetto the edges alone of the ligaments are stretched and apposed; in both cases the sounds being formed, not by the actual vibrations of either the whole or part of the tendons, but by the successive explosions which they allow.

PRESSURE OF THE AIR.

Until now, in our remarks on the manner in which the voice is formed, we have only referred to the rigidity of the glottis, a rigidity necessary to accomplish the 1,056 vibrations in one second ‡ which form the $\frac{do}{4}$ of the chest-voice, and to accomplish the double number which produces the octave above in the head-voice. There is, notwithstanding, another indispensable element for the production of vocal sounds, the pressure of the air. Pressure, as is well known, developes an elastic force in this agent, in a degree inverse to the volume which it occupies. It is by means of this power that the intensity of the sounds is obtained. The intensity of the sound can only depend on the quantity of air which goes to each sharp explosion. I say sharp explosion, as an express condition: the glottis should close itself perfectly after every vibration; for if the air found a constant passage, as in the notes of falsetto, then the greatest movements of the glottis and the greatest waste of air would produce precisely the weakest notes. To reject this theory would be to attribute the intensity of the sound to the extent of the vibrations accomplished by the lips of the glottis, and to suppose that these lips, each taken separately, possess the power of producing sounds, suppositions quite contrary to the facts.

The elastic force of the air arises not only from the compression of the lungs, but also from the contractions of the trachea, which adjusts its calibre to the different dimensions of the glottis. It is by means of this force that the air conquers the continually-increasing obstacle presented by the lips of the glottis when they produce sounds more and more intense.

Thus the problem of the elevation of the voice, always complicated with that of its intensity, in order to be complete, ought to show the connection which exists between the tension of the lips of the glottis, the pressure of the air, and the number and intensity of the explosions obtained. As a consequence, we may state that the greater pressure of air necessary to produce the greater intensity, would at the same time increase the number of pulsations, and so raise the tone; but to prevent this, the glottis must at the same time be lengthened, and vice versâ; or, in other words, that the different lengths of the glottis can, under different degrees of pressure, produce the same number of shocks, but at different degrees of intensity.

OF THE QUALITIES OF THE VOICE.

Various simultaneous causes modify the qualities of the voice:—1. According as the glottis partially or entirely closes the passage between the explosions, it produces veiled or brilliant sounds; 2. The tube which surmounts and surrounds it also greatly effects the quality of the voice; by its contractions it gives brilliancy to it and its widening volume; 3. The epiglottis also plays a very important part, for every time that it lowers itself, and nearly closes the orifice of the larynx, the voice gains in brilliancy; and when, on the other hand, it is drawn up, the voice immediately becomes veiled.

OPERA UTILIZED.

(From "Dexter Smith.")

We learn from an exchange that a German musician intends to compose a series of airs to a medley of newspaper advertisements. The idea seems to us to be a good one, and it has occurred to us that we may help the composer a little perhaps by arranging a few advertisements in a suitable form for adaptation to music. For instance, suppose it is a tailor's advertisement that is selected. We should work it up in some such tender strain as this:—

Oh! come into the garden, Maud,
And sit beneath the rose,
And see me prance around the beds
Dressed in my Sunday clothes.

Oh! come and bring your uncles, Maud,
Your sisters and your aunts,
And tell them Johnson made my coat,
My waiscoat and my pants.

This is pathetic and practical. The verse is filled with sentiment and with a sweet, melodious cadence peculiarly its own; and yet it makes Johnson's pants charmingly conspicuous, and calls attention to his waistcoat, while he idealizes and spiritualizes that useful but comparatively uninteresting article. Then, say we want to set a tobacconist's advertisement. Would we not choose some such fairy-like verse as this:—

Gaily young Ferguson
Bought his cigar—
Bought it at Mulligan's,
Where the best are.

When he wants fine-cut, or
Snuff for his nose,
Gaily young Ferguson
Purchases those.

Few poets could soar as we thus do into the realms of fancy with such a theme; but it is ever thus with genius when its salary is promptly paid, as ours is. We would soar higher if the compensation were larger. As it is, we have given exactly the money's worth.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Since we last recorded what was going on at this establishment (not, of course, taking into account the State visit of the Shah), repetitions have been in a great measure the order of the day. We have had repetitions of nearly all the most favourite operas in which Madame Patti and Mdlle. Albani appear, and of others in which they do not appear. We need not again specify them by name, for their names must be familiar to the opera-going public, and they have probably been given oftener this season than on many previous occasions. At any rate there has been an event of considerable interest,—we mean the revival of one of the earliest of Signor Verdi's operas—one of the earliest at least to which he is indebted for the great popularity he enjoys. This was interesting because it had not been heard in London for seven years, and because it afforded that gifted and versatile lady, Mdme. Adelina Patti, an opportunity of acquiring fresh distinction. Ernani, owing its libretto (like Rigoletto and Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia) to one of Victor Hugo's most famous plays, exhibits a marked advance upon Nabucco (1842) and I Lombardi (1843)—by a year or two its immediate precursors. If not to be compared with Verdi's riper and more strikingly original works, it nevertheless contains indications, too evident to be overlooked, of his future adopted style. Among them the most conspicuous are the recitative and cavatina of Elvira, "Ernani involami;" the scene in which Ernani makes the solemn pledge to Don Silva—his Nemesis in an old man's garb and beard; the grand finale, where the conspirators are surprised by Don Carlos, now King of Spain; the amatory supplication, "Vieni meco," addressed by the King to Elvira; and the trio where the lovers, united at last, are interrupted by the notes of the fatal horn, the signal proposed by Ernani; who, as a true Castilian, redeems his pledge and stabs himself, Elvira falling prostrate over the body of her lover, while Don Silva exults in the consummation of his revenge. These are all in Verdi's best manner, and rank among his happiest inspirations. Portions of the opera are comparatively weak, but such writing would redeem a work of even less pretensions. More it would be superfluous to say; both the music and story of Ernani—although of recent years it has enjoyed fewer opportunities of appreciation than other operas from the same hand—being more or less familiar to the majority of amateurs.

It is always agreeable to hear Madame Patti in some new part. She invariably brings a reading of her own, and puts the stamp of her individuality upon whatever she undertakes. Since Sophie Cruvelli, who possessed unlimited means for the task, we have not heard the music of Elvira sung so uniformly well, except by Angiolina Bosio; while it would be difficult to imagine anything more poetically conceived, more justly balanced, or more thoroughly finished than Madame Patti's dramatic realization. This was observable from the opening cavatina, "Ernani involami," to the concluding trio, when Don Silva obtains the retribution for which he has waited with such exemplary patience. We shall not go through the opera scene by scene; it is unnecessary. Enough that the last—the scene of the festivities in the palace of Don Giovanni of Arragon to celebrate the wedding of Elvira with the proscribed Ernani, now restored to position and estate by the clemency of the king—was, as it ought to be, the real climax. Here every situation, every point, was made the most of, from the joy of the bride to the despair of Elvira on witnessing the terrible catastrophe. The rush, dagger in hand, as if with an uncontrollable impulse, to kill Don Silva, and the transition, when, as suddenly conscious of her impotency, Elvira sinks at his feet and implores his mercy, were not less finely conceived than admirably executed—picturesque both, and both at the same time natural. But further minute details are uncalled for. Madame Patti has imagined and pourtrayed a new character, in which we have only to fear that the waning popularity of the opera of which that character is the heroine may prevent her from often being seen.

Signor Mongini played Ernani on the first night, and gave the opening air, in which the chorus of banditti are engaged, with all his well-known power of voice and declamatory vigour. Signor Graziani's pure baritone was heard to rare advantage in "Vieni meco," which he might sing even better if he would deliver its tuneful phrases in stricter time, and let them speak for themselves in a manner worthy their own unaffected simplicity. Signor Bagagiolo, with a bass voice equally fine, and precisely suited for the music allotted by Verdi to Don Silva, gave it in most instances with full effect, but left something to desire in the histrionic delineation of the obdurate old Spanish grandee. The general execution of the opera was, on the whole, very good.

The first performance of the Huguenots, this season, was in some respects hardly up to the Covent Garden mark. Although, as we have already said, possessing unquestionable merits, including a pleasing voice, a certain intelligence, and an engaging personal appearance, Mdlle. d'Angeri is by no means yet equal to the adequate representation of Valentine—a part more trying and arduous than that of Selika in the Africaine, with which she made her début this season. There were good points in her performance; but we earnestly recommend her for the present to curb her ambition. About the Marguerite of Madame Sinico, the Urbain of Mdlle. Scalchi, the Raoul of Signor Nicolini, the Marcel of Signor Bagagiolo, the Nevers of Signor Cotogni, and—last not least—the St. Bris of M. Faure, there is nothing new to say. The young lady who made her début with I Puritani, as Elvira, is hardly yet capable of sustaining a character in which so many distinguished artists, from Grisi and Persiani downwards, have appeared before her. Her intentions may be good, but her means of carrying them out are insufficient. Let Mdlle. Trisolini try again, but in an opera exacting less responsibility. Certain points in her performance were agreeable enough, but, taken as a whole, it was not what the public has a right to look for at the Royal Italian Opera. The Arturo of the evening was the new tenor, Signor Pavani; Signors Graziani and Bagagiolo, as usual, appearing as Riccardo and Giorgio. The opera on Saturday night was Rigoletto, Mdlle. Albani repeating her charming impersonation of Gilda, and Signor Graziani once more, vice Signor Cotogni—to whom it was intrusted earlier in the season—resuming the part of the Court Buffoon. Signor Graziani sang with his accustomed expression and acted with all his old vigour and characteristic enthusiasm. His greatest success was the duet with Gilda, in the Palace of the adventurous Duke of Mantua (Signor Nicolini), after which he was recalled, with Mdlle. Albani, before the curtain, and compelled to repeat the last movement. Mdlle. Scalchi, as usual, played Maddelena; and Signor Tagliafico, as usual, played Sparafucile.

The operas performed during the week have been—La Sonnambula, with Madame Albani (Monday); L'Elisir d'Amore, with Mdlle. Smeroschi (Tuesday); Les Diamans de la Couronne (at last), with Madame Adelina Patti as Caterina, and Madame Monbelli as Diana (Thursday); and Martha (Friday). Les Diamans is announced again for to-night (Saturday). About this, more in our next.

EXHIBITION CONCERTS.

Apropos of the excellent and, we are happy to learn, prosperous concerts conducted every afternoon in the Albert Hall, the Musical Standard observes:—

"Turning to the daily performances of orchestral and vocal music, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, we still find much to admire, little to criticise, and nothing to object to. Even our criticism would be chiefly directed at the empty benches which too often face the clever performers, instead of lines of attentive listeners. We are inclined to think, however, that the numbers of the audience are increasing, and it is certainly only to be expected they should. The highest tribute must be paid to the judgment with which the pieces are selected. In fact, if a daily attendance at the Albert Hall did not improve a pupil's taste, we are not aware of any public performances that would have that effect. As a rule, two classical overtures, one symphony, and two or three good songs are given. Our readers can readily imagine the symphonies and overtures usually played, but it may be mentioned that works so little hackneyed as Gade's Symphony, No. 4, Spohr's (so-called) Historical Symphony, and Mr. Henry Gadsby's concert overture, 'Andromeda,' have been introduced. The orchestra is highly efficient, and a good analytical programme is sold at the unusually low price of threepence. Another step in the right direction."

We may add to the foregoing that on Monday and Tuesday next will be performed Bach's Overture and Suite in B minor for flute and strings—a work which, so far as we know, has never been publicly heard in England.

PARMA.—If report speaks truly, Signor Mercuri's Adelinda is to be produced here next Carnival.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The musical proceedings on the occasion of the Shah's visit to Sydenham began with the "Coronation March" from Meyerbeer's Le Prophète, one of the most imposing pieces of pageant music belonging to modern opera. This was given with much effect by the Crystal Palace orchestra, augmented by large reinforcements from various military bands. Then followed the "Chorus of Dervishes," from the music composed by Beethoven to Kotzebue's Die Ruinen von Athen. This wondrously suggestive piece—which conveys so strong an impression of the gyrations of a body of fanatics—was well given by the large choir associated with the orchestra. Another extract from the same work, the beautiful march and chorus, "Twine ye the Garlands," was also given; preceded by the romanza from Luisa Miller, sung by Signor Urio, and the lament of Fides, "Ah! mon fils," from Le Prophète, by Mdme. Irene de Sassi. The Barcarole of Fra Diavolo was given by Signor Naudin, after which Mdlle. Marimon sang, with great success, the bravura song of the Queen of Night, "Non paventar," from Il Flauto Magico; and the aria, "Sorgete," from Maometto—rendered by Signor Foli—was followed by a so-called Persian March, by Strauss, which replaced that by Signor Vianesi, originally announced. The duet, "Si la stanchezza," from Il Trovatore (Mdme. Sassi and Signor Naudin); Bishop's serenade, "Sleep, gentle lady," well sung by the choir and encored; the duo from Marta, "Solo profugo" (Signori Urio and Foli); the march and chorus from Tannhäuser, by the united bands and choir; the "Shadow Song," from Dinorah, by Mdlle. Marimon; and the "Marche et Cortége," from M. Gounod's La Reine de Saba, completed the list of familiar extracts. The military bands then played some pieces, and the March from Le Prophète was given—as before—while the Shah was proceeding to the Royal dais. When His Majesty was seated, a "Persian love-song" was performed. This was an adaptation, by Mr. Manns, of a chorus for female voices in the Russian opera, by Glinka, Ruslan and Ludmilla. The words, as given yesterday, are written by Mr. Sutherland Edwards, in imitation of the Persian by Mirza Schaffy; and the piece produced a pleasing effect in its performance by the ladies of the choir, accompanied by the Crystal Palace Band. The concert terminated with a characteristic instrumental piece, for the united bands, entitled "Kurroglou." This is the name of a famous bandit-minstrel of Northern Persia, referred to by Mr. Carl Engel in his elaborate work "On the Study of National Music," from which source Mr. Manns has derived his theme and hints for its treatment, which he has turned to very good account. With this appropriate finale the concert terminated, after a continuous course of about two hours. Mr. Manns conducted with his well-known skill. Other performances, by military bands, including various national airs, followed.

M. WALDEC'S BENEFIT.

An interesting performance took place last Saturday afternoon at the Olympic Theatre, for the benefit of M. Waldec, himself an agreeable and accomplished concert-singer, with a sympathetic baritone voice and a cultivated style.

Probably the most interesting feature was the pianoforte performance of M. Gounod. Those who fancied that the composer of Faust was about to take up the part of a thorough-bred, thoroughly trained pianist; that he would exhibit himself, for instance, in one of Beethoven's sonatas, or in a steeple-chase show piece by Liszt, were, of course, mistaken. He simply played, neatly, with nice expression, and generally, it may be imagined, as it should be played, his own Marche funèbre d'une Marionette. The little march is very pretty, and one fancies that there is something fantastic about it; an idea derived chiefly from the title. There is, however, a certain thoughtless gaiety in the theme which contrasts with suggestions of a funereal kind in the accompaniment; the former, we suppose, being indicative of the careless, insouciant sort of life led by a marionette; the latter, of extinction, which, even to marionettes, is a serious thing. What it may be in other hands we cannot say; but, as played by its own composer, this Puppet's Funeral March is a charming production. The warm applause which the very appearance of M. Gounod on the stage elicited ought, in some slight degree, to console him for the tribulations to which, from no matter what cause, he has been exposed since his residence in England. Legally, in a country which piques itself on its "law-abiding" disposition, everything, no doubt, takes place in England precisely as it should take place; but our copyright, and especially our acting-right, laws, in regard to foreign productions, are cruelly insufficient. Unfortunately for M. Gounod, he could not foresee, in composing Faust for the Théâtre Lyrique, that he was producing a work which, before long, would not only gain for its composer a European reputation, but would cause a furore in every European capital. Dickens was not worse treated by the publishers of the United States, nor Balzac by the publishers of Belgium, than M. Gounod, in the matter of Faust, has been treated by the operatic managers of England. A very small per-centage on the receipts or, let us say, net profits derived from the representations of Faust would have placed thousands of pounds in the pockets of the man who created, by the purest act of invention, the rich artistic property Faust has shown itself to be; a property by which managers, prima donnas, tenors, and all sorts of operatic notabilities, down to, and including, the librarians who speculate in tickets, have derived special benefits, but which, to its composer, as far, at least, as England is concerned, has not brought a farthing. It may be said on behalf of managers that everything has taken place according to law, which only proves that under the law acts of the most crying injustice may be committed.

But to return to the Olympic, where the two best performances of the day—both by artists who took care not to travel out of their proper region—were those of M. Waldec, who was heard in a composition for a single voice, and in a duet with Mrs. Weldon, both pieces by M. Gounod; and of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, who looked on and listened from the stalls until his turn arrived to take his place as an executant on the stage. Then, nothing in particular being set down for him on the programme, he profited by what he had heard, and improvised a free fantasia on the subject of M. Gounod's pianoforte piece, Marche funèbre d'une Marionette, and one of his songs, "La biondina." It was already known that this artist and humourist could be ingenious and fanciful as well as severely classical; and, apart from the thing played, the playing itself was something to hear.

HERR WILHELM GANZ'S MORNING CONCERT.

One of the best concerts this season was that given on Friday, the 27th, by Herr Ganz. Its only fault was its great length, and its only disappointment the inability to appear of Mr. Sims Reeves, whose place was taken by Mr. Edward Lloyd. This now popular tenor has much improved during the last year or so. Schumann's quintet was the first piece, and the pianoforte part was sustained by the concert-giver, his coadjutors being Mr. Colyns, Messrs. Ries, R. Blagrove, and Paque. Mr. Ganz, in this work, and in a portion of Weber's Concertstück, as well as in two other morceaux, displayed, as usual, his chief characteristic—neatness. If there be no great genius in his playing, smoothness and precision may generally be observed; grand crescendo and power marking some passages, exquisite delicacy and tenderness distinguishing other passages. He appears to be quite content with placing his author before his hearers in an unobtrusive way. It is not every pianist that can make the listener hold his breath, nor is it every pianist that can please; and, to judge from the applause that Mr. Ganz received, it may safely be inferred that he gave his admirers very great pleasure. The other instrumental solo was by Mons. Paque, whose violoncello playing is too well known to need any description here. Suffice it that his performance evinced its usual characteristics and excellences.

The vocal music was rendered by Mdlle. Marimon, Miss Edith Wynne, Mdlle. Carola, Miss D'Alton, and Madame Patey; Signori Gardoni and Foli, M. Jules Lefort, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. Mdlle. Marimon's vocalisation is peculiar. The facility of execution with which, among other things, she rendered a waltz by Mattei bordered on the marvellous. Miss Edith Wynne sang a ballad in her well-known expressive style. Mdlle. Carola sang Ganz's new song, "La Camelia," which was encored, though its rendering seemed laboured rather than spontaneous. Madame Patey and Miss D'Alton were recalled after their songs to receive special plaudits. The same honour was conferred upon Signor Gardoni and M. Lefort for the manner in which they proved themselves true artists. Signor Foli gave one verse of "Qui sdegno" in his well-known style. The hall was crowded. Signori Visetti, Tito Mattei, Mr. Emile Berger, Herr Lehmeyer, and Mr. Ganz, were the accompanists.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

(From the "Morning Post.")

The performance of a new work by an English composer is an event demanding more than a passing notice, especially if it is the production of one who has already achieved success in his art. Mr. J. F. Barnett is favourably known as the composer of the Ancient Mariner and Paradise and the Peri, works highly esteemed by choral societies all over the country. The latest composition from his pen is an oratorio, The Raising of Lazarus, a subject entirely novel as regards musical treatment. That Mr. Barnett has approached his task with a thoughtful mind those who heard the work performed will most readily admit, and that he has not been unsuccessful the frequent expressions of applause at every possible opportunity may be mentioned as one among many proofs of the effect produced. The oratorio is in two parts, the first dealing with the sickness and death of Lazarus and the departure of Jesus to Bethany; the second details the sorrows of the sisters of Lazarus, Martha and Mary; the tender human sympathy of the Saviour, the raising of Lazarus, and his thanksgiving joined with that of the people. The words have been selected with much care from the Douay version of the Holy Scriptures, and to suit the purposes of the music have been grouped into thirty numbers. The whole work has been so arranged that the interest once excited is well maintained, and the unity of the treatment is one of not the least remarkable features of the composition. A short, massive introduction in the key of F prepares the way for a fugal subject in D minor, written in a most scholarly style; and this piece, while answering the purpose of an overture, also serves as a prelude to the first chorus, into which it leads without pause. This chorus, "Great is the Lord," shows at once a great improvement upon Mr. Barnett's choral pieces in his former works, for the demands upon the voices are more moderately made, and, consequently, a greater, broader, and more pleasing effect is obtained than if the higher register of the several voices had been used for the sake of obtaining a temporary brilliancy. In this, as in all the succeeding choruses, a certain amount of wisdom and good taste has been shown in the manner in which the vocal parts have been laid out, while the instrumentation—always a strong point in the whole of the work—arrests the attention of the musical hearer by its apt character and general fitness. Mr. Barnett has also done wisely in breaking what might otherwise be a monotony by a free use of fugal counterpoint in nearly all the longer choruses. This, while it is not inconsistent with the character of the subject, interests both hearers and performers, and secures an amount of variety not easy to gain by other means.

Following his chorus is the first of the recitatives, and the manner in which they have been designed shows an earnest desire to trust to his own thoughts rather than tamely to repeat worn out forms. Credit must also be given to the composer for disregarding the wearisome and unsatisfactory style of accompanying recitatives with a violoncello and double-bass, a method which limits power and effect. There is no reason why a recitative should not have an occasional colouring suitable to the matter described by its words—all who have seen or who have made rough sketches know how telling a little bit of local colouring often is—and as recitatives are more or less sketches in music, Mr. Barnett is to be praised for having treated his in such wise as to make them often interesting, and always as suggestive as possible. The arias in the work possess grace, melody, and that special charm of symmetry that always delight an audience; and the good disposition of those who heard the performance last night was increased as the work progressed after the first aria. "Show forth thy wonderful mercies" was sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington. There is a duet for soprano and contralto, "Why turnest Thou Thy face away," which is one of the many gems in the work; and following this is a chorus, "Blessed are they," which will always be pleasing for its graceful and striking themes and motion. The sixth number, a contralto air in D flat, is one that will always be effective, even when given by voices of less power and beauty than that of Mrs. Patey, who sang it last night; and the unaccompanied trio for soprano, contralto, and tenor is a piece of such graceful writing that it will doubtless always secure the reception accorded to it on its first performance. After the trio the voice of Lazarus (Mr. Santley) is heard for the first time in an aria descriptive of his sickness and distress; and a chorale for the organ, with a few effective notes for the horns, is supposed to depict the solemnity of death—as the almost unaccompanied quartet which precedes, "Blessed are the dead," does the comfort, arising to the survivors from the death of a righteous man. But, as human sorrow often refuses to be comforted, the sentiments conveyed in the duet, "O Lord, why hast Thou cast us off," are not altogether out of place at this point.

The hymn of the disciples on the banks of the Jordan, for men's voices only, is by no means a bad piece of writing, full of melody and agreeable harmonies. For the better performance of this number the voices of the contraltos were employed to strengthen the upper part, but it would have been more effective if men's voices alone could have been heard in the piece. The recitatives and choruses which follow describe the determination of the Saviour to go to Lazarus, in the face of the fact that His life is threatened by the Jews; and His departure is supposed to have been made, and His arrival anticipated, in a very well worked-up quartet and chorus, "Blessed is He who cometh in the name of the Lord," with which the first part ends.

A bold and effective chorus, "O magnify the Lord," opens the second part, in which a striking subject is proposed and imitated by all the parts in succession, in a somewhat more shortened form than is needful to make a perfect fugue, but the theme to the words "But the countenance of the Lord" is more completely treated, and, with a return to the first subject, the chorus ends satisfactorily. It should be stated that the narrative part of the work is given to a tenor voice, and there are also some pieces of melodious writing for that voice other than the declamation of the connecting incidents and the words of Jesus, notably in the duet, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here my brother had not died." Concerning this it may be remarked, in passing, that Mr. Barnett has laid himself open to criticism for having set the word "died," now as though it had two, and now as having but one syllable. This is, however, not a grave fault, but it is one that might have been avoided with advantage. There is also an excellent air for tenor, "Blessed are they that mourn," which was sung in musician-like style by Mr. Wilford Morgan, by whom the whole of the tenor music was given most creditably, more especially as it was undertaken at a short notice in consequence of Mr. Vernon Rigby's indisposition. The part for the principal bass voice is comparatively limited, but it is well designed, the aria, "Praise ye the Lord," being a good specimen of joyful declamation. It may not be considered desirable to speak further of the details of this excellent work, as from the description given above it will be gathered that there is enough in the oratorio to make an era in the career of its composer, who may be honestly congratulated upon having produced a melodious and well-written work that will be gladly welcomed as an agreeable addition to the repertories of choral societies.

Mr. Barnett has evidently taken Mendelssohn as the model upon which he has based the style of his work; has set his well-ordered libretto in a most acceptable style; and has, in short, produced a composition of which he may with reason be proud.

SIGNOR TITO MATTEI'S CONCERT.

Signor Tito Mattei's grand evening concert was given in St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, the 21st ult., his friends and patrons assembling in sufficient numbers to completely fill the large room. The concert began with Verdi's terzetto "Te sol quest anima," which was capitally sung by Madame Colombo, Signor Danieli, and Signor Caravoglia. Mdlle. Marimon, whose first appearance this season was heartily welcomed, gave a good rendering of Mattei's "Che Gioja;" she also joined Madame Colombo in Rossini's duet "No Matilde, non marral," both ladies at the conclusion of the piece being recalled amid much and deserved applause. Mdlle. Ilma di Muraka contributed Mattei's valzer, "Vo danzar" (recalled), and achieved a great success in the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, having to return to the platform three times to acknowledge the plaudits of the gratified audience. Madame Lablache was heard to advantage in "Ah! mon fils," and Mdlle. Colombo was recalled for a good rendering of "The Nightingale's Trill" (Ganz). Non e ver" (Mattei) was splendidly sung by Signor Naudin, and repeated in response to a unanimous encore, which had doubtless not less reference to the merits of that most successful piece than to the merits of its execution. A new and effective romanza by the same composer, entitled "Si e ver," was sung by Signor Caravoglia, and was received with much favour. Signor Gardoni was recalled for a graceful delivery of Raimo's serenata, "Nel silenzio e nel mistero," and Signor Foli obtained a like honour for his capital singing of Halèvy's aria "Se il rigor." Songs were also contributed by Signor Danieli, Signor Borello, M. Jules Lefort, and Mr. Maybrick. An interesting feature of the concert was the performance (first time) by Signor Mattei of Rossini's pianoforte solo, "Tarantella pur sang," with chorus. It was splendidly rendered and repeated in response to a vociferous encore. We hope soon to be able to say more about this very interesting novelty, but enough for the present, that its production gave a special interest to Signor Mattei's concert. The bénéficiaire also delighted his audience by the brilliant execution of two of his own pianoforte solos. Other instrumental pieces performed were a violin solo, well played by Mr. Colyns, and a quartet for four pianos, in which Signori Li Calsi, Bevignani, E. Mattei, and Tito Mattei were associated. The accompanists were Signor Pinsuti, Signor Randegger, Signor Li Calsi, and Herr Ganz. We congratulate Signor Mattei on the success of his capital concert, which demonstrated alike his own ability, and the favour that ability has secured from the general public.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS' CONCERT.

We are late with our report of this successful entertainment, but "better late than never" applies to the case in a particular sense. It is the last of a series of echoes that people must strain their ears to catch. The concert took place in Hanover Square Rooms on the 12th ult., and was attended by a very full and enthusiastic audience, who seemed delighted with everything that was done. Mr. Richards' varied talent as composer and executant was largely represented in the programme. The first piece was his chorus, "The harp of Wales," sung by the St. Thomas's Choir, under Signor Randegger. The second piece was the "Boat song," also sung by the St. Thomas's Choir. The fifth piece was his arrangement of the "Monk's march," from Songs of Wales. The sixth piece was his chorus, "The soldier's glorious duty," also from Songs of Wales. The ninth piece was his "She must be mine," from Songs of Wales, sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas. The tenth piece was his "Welsh Carol," from Songs of Wales. The eleventh piece was his pianoforte Fantasia, Songs of Wales, played by himself, and lustily applauded. The twelfth piece was his arrangement of a Welsh air, entitled, "Loudly proclaim." The fourteenth piece was his new part-song, "Let the Hills resound," capitally sung and enthusiastically encored as it deserved. The fifteenth piece was his arrangement of a Welsh air, "March to Battle." The sixteenth piece was his first fantasia, Recollections of Wales, played by himself and rapturously encored. The seventeenth piece was his arrangement of "Y Deryn pur" (also encored). The nineteenth piece was his "Cambrian Plume." The twenty-first piece was his arrangement of a Welsh air, "Idle Days in Summer Time." The twenty-second piece was his arrangement of "The Ash Grove." The twenty-fourth piece was his arrangement of "The Men of Harlech;" and the twenty-fifth piece was his "God Bless the Prince of Wales." We give these things in detail that it may be seen how far the occasion was a Festival of Welsh Song, and how far Mr. Richards and the music of his country are able to present an entertainment which can be heard from first to last with unflagging zest. Mr. Richards is wise to make his concert thus distinctive, and he has only to choose to do so in order to lay the basis of a real Welsh festival in the capital of the "Sassenach."

ST. JAME'S THEATRE.

The production of another opera by the composer of La Fille de Madame Angot was the natural result of the general favour with which that most graceful and pleasing work of M. Lecocq was received. If Les Cent Vierges, now being played by the St. James's troupe, does not contain so many airs of a remarkable character as its predecessor, the music is throughout brisk and sparkling, and well adapted to the numerous comic situations of the piece with which it is connected; while the subject and dramatic framework of the the latter is far better suited, by its bustling movement and farcical breadth, to the taste as well as the intelligence of an English audience. The notion is decidedly a funny one—of two married women, one a lady of some rank, the other a plebeian, who has attached herself by main force to her aristocratic acquaintance, picked up on a travelling tour, being accidentally carried off, while innocently visiting a ship in the Thames, with a cargo of candidates for matrimony; emigrating to a colony of disconsolate bachelors, called by the author L'Isle Verte, while their husbands are left to trace them as best they can to their destination; where they arrive only just in time to save them from being absorbed by the ravenous demand for home partners existing among the colonists. The presence of the husbands in the island, and the disturbance which their claims make in the arrangements about to be made, lead to a series of droll adventures; in the course of which, to save themselves from the severity of the governor of the isle, they are induced to assume female garments. The humour of such resources as the latter for raising laughter is apt in this country; and when trusted to such actors as we possess likely to undertake parts of this character, is apt to degenerate into something very objectionable to English ideas of decency and delicacy; but handled by these artists the grossness evaporates in the light and airy treatment, and the tact shown in gliding over delicate ground, as well as the unconsciousness of manner with which risky things are said and done, renders palatable and enjoyable, even to the fastidious, an entertainment which would, without modifications seriously endangering the fun of the whole affair, inevitably meet with a very different reception. The whole opera bouffe is admirably acted. Mdlle. Luigi, who carries off her songs with that effective dash which makes her such a favourite, is capitally contrasted with the broad, homely humour of Madame Delorme as Madame Foulardot. Mario Widmer, as the husband of the former, Le Marquis Quillembois, makes up as a strapping virago, with just as much of the feminine graces as keeps the characterisation within the lines of what is tolerable, and acts with undoubted spirit; while the actor with whom he is associated in his feminine masquerade, without being intensely droll, fills his part adequately and with the same amount of good taste. The life of the whole piece, however, is M. Joly, as the governor of the wifeless islanders, whose facial grotesqueness is the source of unceasing laughter, and whose acting is conceived in the spirit of the most genuine, although rollicking, drollery, which, abounding in flashes and outbreaks of eccentric gesture and expression, as it does, frequently bordering on and touching the utmost limit of even French license, yet never becomes "positively shocking"—to use the stereotyped expression used by our neighbours to denote outraged English prudery. The alternation of Les Cent Vierges with La Fille de Madame Angot in the bills of this house now gives an opportunity of gratifying either a taste for opera bouffe in its quietest and most elegant form, or that in which it gives its eccentric tendencies the fullest elbow-room permissible by the laws of decorum and the scrutinising censure of the Lord Chamberlain.

CAROLINE VAN BEETHOVEN.*

We extract the annexed communication from the Neue Freie Presse: "The Viennese correspondent of the Cölnische Zeitung writes to us as follows: 'There is living here in Vienna in a state of the deepest poverty—that genteel poverty, of course, which shuns aught like ostentation—Mdme. Caroline van Beethoven, the widow of Beethoven's nephew. The writer would fain excite an interest in her fate among those circles in Germany where pious veneration exists for a great man. The good old lady, in her dire distress, petitioned the Intendancy of the Imperial Theatres kindly to allow her a per-centage on the performances of Fidelio. Her petition was flatly refused, but subsequently, during Münch's administration, and through the mediation of Dingelstedt, she was allowed an annual pension of 'one hundred' florins. This small grant was, however, inexorably cancelled at the last change of management, and now the poor and aged lady, who lives with her weakly, yet most industrious, daughter in the strictest retirement, is left almost destitute —of course without daring to take any fresh steps, which she foresees would be useless, with the proper authorities. Perhaps the directors of the Operahouses of the different sovereign courts of Germany might resolve to allow the great composer's niece an honorary salary, which they still owe him.'" The Neue Freie Presse then goes on to remark: "With reference to a letter to the Cölnische Zeitung, quoted in our edition of this evening, the official Oœsterreichische Correspondenz contains the following communiqué: In the year 1865, a petition signed 'Caroline van Beethoven, widow of a nephew of Ludwig van Beethoven,' was sent in, praying for a per-centage on the Fidelio performances. The Chief-Board-of-Theatrical-Management rejected the petition, which was unsupported by any sort of proof. The petitioner renewed her request in 1866 and 1867. She was informed in reply that, if, by the production of her baptismal and marriage certificates, she could legally prove her asserted relationship, everything possible should be done. To this request, the fulfilment of which, as the Cölnische Zeitung itself must allow, was an indispensable condition of anything to be done for the benefit of the petitioner, the latter took no notice, either then, or in her later petitions. Though, however, the proof of the relationship with the great master was never furnished, nor ever even referred to, the petitioner has received from the General Intendancy, on two different occasions, a sum of 100 florins. (This is a striking contradiction. The Chief-Board-of-Theatrical-Management should not have granted the petitioner, if perfectly unknown, assistance to the amount of several hundred florins; but if they were morally convinced—as the grants show they were—of the petitioner's identity, pious reverence for the great composer certainly demanded a more humane course)."—In order to be quite sure whether the wife of Beethoven's warmly loved nephew Carl is really in so sad and destitute a condition, we have applied to gentlemen of approved competence and standing to make the requisite enquiries. If the mournful account should be corroborated—and it seems likely it will be—we hope we shall see the musical world of Berlin prove by vigorous action that the name of Beethoven, a name that says so much, lives not only on their lips, but in their very inmost hearts as well.

FRAGMENTS FROM THE STAR CITY OF MONTALLUYAH.

BY HERMES.

"A very curious book, very cleverly written. . . . Likely to contain hints on a vast number of subjects of interest to mankind."—Saturday Review.

"Hermes is a really practical philosopher, and utters many truths that must be as useful to this sublunary sphere as to those of another world. . . . Of his powers of narrative and expression there can be no doubt."—Morning Post.

"A romance of science. . . . Few volumes that have ever come under our hands are more entertaining to read or more difficult to criticise."—Sunday Times.

"We can recommend 'Another World' as decidedly clever and original."—Literary World.

"Whether one reads for information or amusement, 'Another World' will attract and retain the attention. It reminds one somewhat of Swift's 'Gulliver,' without the grossness and the ill-nature."—Standard.

"'Another World' can be safely recommended as sure to afford amusement, combined with no little instruction."—Echo.

"'Hermes' is to be congratulated upon having written with much ingenuity and descriptive power. The book will doubtless attract, as, indeed, it deserves, a good deal of attention."—Court Circular.

". . . We might quote much more, and fill many columns from this curious work, but we have, probably, said enough to stimulate the curiosity of our readers, who will, we have no doubt, speedily procure it, and peruse for themselves the fanciful and elaborate descriptions of the author. Many amusing and clever suggestions are embodied in its pages, and we cannot help suspecting that some of the ingenious speculations regarding the Star Worlds are intended by the author as good-humoured satires upon the familiar institutions of this hum-drum every-day life of ours."—Era.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1873.

THE due recognition of honest merit is its best, or one of its best rewards. Such a prize is by no means easy to win; least of all among quiet, steady-going English folk. We have indeed our gusts of fashion, swaying from time to time the popular taste, but these affect chiefly the lighter forms of public entertainment. The demand for the graver kind of music is little touched by them. "Classical" art—would that it could be christened by some less repellent name!—is the pursuit, for the most part, of serious people. Their likes and dislikes take some time to form, and it is not one ordeal, but a long series of many, spread over many years, which musicians must pass before they can be recognised as leaders among the artist brotherhood. Such recognition is most worth having when it comes unsought. The art-world is full enough—though not fuller, perhaps, than other worlds—of self-seeking, of small ambitions, of the baser "commercial" spirit, and it is pleasant to see a career showing just the opposite of all this crowned with a success which no man grudges or disputes. The lesson is one which it is as well not to lose, in the interests of art and of all true artists. The moral of it is, indeed, old enough. Plato's perpetual antithesis about being wise and seeming wise, knowing and seeming to know, is true of music as much as of philosophy. The struggle of most artistic careers is to seem to be a great artist. Even when the artistic power is real, and not seeming, the use it is put to shows that the ambition to be thought great has been the main stimulus to work. But these are examples which remind us that the best way, after all, to be thought a great artist, is to be one.

A genuine devotion to the art, as to a sacred ministry of beauty, is the best strengthener of the artistic faculty. The power gathered by self-suppression can give even plain talent the inspiration of genius. But the mad thirsting after fame for fame's sake, who shall say how many of the tragedies of genius have come from this? Every art has had its Haydons and its Chattertons, its stories of careers blighted by the passion for seeming, the desire to astonish the vulgar world by the flash of a passing celebrity. For this sentiment, this type of art, as applied to matters musical, there is a special name. It is called "Virtuosity"—a relic, we suppose, of that miserable artistic vocabulary current in the last century, which regarded art as a "fancy," and treated the products of human genius chiefly according to their capacity for being ticketed and put under glass cases, as articles of vertu—that is, as testimony to the elegant taste of their possessor. "Virtuosity" regards music as a means of glorifying the cleverness of the artist, just as the Strawberry Hill or Walpolian view of sculpture and painting regarded those arts as providential arrangements for distinguishing the upper classes from the proletaires. The little good it has done to music is limited to the degree in which it has helped to enlarge the limits of mechanical attainment. The harm it has done to the art—that is, to the world in relation to the art—by degrading the business of producing music into an entertaining craft, has been, on the other hand, infinite. Against this vice of "virtuosity" some artists—let us be thankful for it—make a magnificent protest. We may see sometimes—most of us have seen—artists of great fame and of real power whose every note betrays that they think of their art solely (or chiefly) as a contrivance for displaying their own cleverness. Your virtuoso proper exhibits this not only in every stroke of his bow, every turn of his wrist, but in the manner in which he walks on and off his platform, in the air with which he bows to his audience. And when he plays, you will feel instinctively that he is not displaying the beauty of the music by his skill, but displaying his skill in the music. You will feel the same if he is but leading a quartet. In every stroke, strong and masterly as it may be, you will detect a subtle emphasis of self-obtrusion—an extra turn, or unexpected pressure, which seems to say to the listeners, "Never mind these three respectable people—listen to me—

Digitized by Google

I am the artiste, the virtuoso. See what a charming tone this is—how cleverly I did that cadence—how neatly I got through that double stopping." In other cases you have the artist absorbed in the music. You see mechanical resources which might furnish the armouries of half-a-dozen virtuosi used without the least apparent consciousness of having anything to display. The player is wrapped up in the music, and he carries the listener with him right into the heart of what he is playing. When hearing Beethoven, you think only of Beethoven, or perhaps not even so; but only of the music. The result so absorbs you that you forget the process, and it is only when you deliberately watch the process that you have leisure to note how marvellous it is. This is real art. The man who has reached this point has attained a power over men. The virtuoso's craft is but the jugglery which makes small children wonder. L.

IN one of those frank disclosures of private doings which give zest to the Musical Union Record, we find it stated that Herr Rubinstein visited Herr Bülow during his short stay in London, and adjured him thus :—

"Go to America, I have paved the way. Previous to my visit, the American amateurs had been regaled with nothing but bravura and sensational music. The ground is now clear, and you will command success. There is very little poetry or romance among the Americans; their all-engrossing object in life seems to make and spend money. Nevertheless, they are far more impressionable than the English, the least musical of all people on the face of the earth."

Assuming this to be correctly reported, we have here a "wondrous tale," compounded of impudence and—well, tarradiddles. What will our American cousins think when they learn that, till Rubinstein visited them, they were musical savages, and that even now, destitute of poetry and romance, their only enjoyment is in making and spending money? What did Herr Bülow think on hearing that Rubinstein had kindly "cleared the ground?" And what will the English think on being told that they are the "least musical of all people on the face of the earth?"—Probably they will, in their goodness of heart, excuse Herr Rubinstein;—he never took much money out of England.

"ANOTHER WORLD."*

We read in the pages of our learned contemporary, the Scotsman, the following remarks upon Another World, about which intelligent people in all circles have been talking for months past, which has now reached its third edition, and, the important contents of the book taken into consideration, will, doubtless, before it has been exhaustively examined and digested, reach its twelfth:—

"It is a natural wish on the part of those who are anxious to set the world straight to clothe and present their ideas, wishes, suggestions, and hopes in such a manner as to make them acceptable to those it is desired to influence. There can, moreover, be little doubt that much of good honest thought—which would, if presented in the nakedness of theoretical definition, find comparatively few people disposed to take the trouble of analysing it—appeals, and appeals not without results, to the many when put into an attractive shape. Simply to sit down and pen an elaborate essay on the evils of this our present world, and on the wickedness and folly of its inhabitants, is not likely to do much active definite good, for the few who will read such pessimistic lucubrations may possibly admit its partial or its entire truth, but the world at large will wag on undismayed. But if an author has sufficient play of fancy at his command to robe his ideas in the similitude of a purely ideal creation, he may beguile his readers into listening to his say. Some such idea would seem to have prompted the author of Another World, who, in the volume now before us, expatiates on the customs obtaining in some other planet than ours, peopled by the "constitutents of a highly civilised and even polished society," whose attention seemingly has been occupied by many subjects analogous to those which form the leading problem of civilisation among us, such as "health, education, marriage, the removal of disease, the prevention of madness and of crime, the arts of government, the regulation of amusement, the efficient employment of physical forces," &c. It is pleasant enough to finger the pages of such a volume as this, but it is extremely difficult to criticise its contents. Another World lacks the strong romantic charm of Lord Lytton's Coming Race; it is equally deficient in the pungent satire of Grenhow; but we are entitled to place it on a much higher level than the insane drivel of Kennaquhair. It is a pleasant enough, if vague, Utopia the author conjures up; only, as is not unfrequently the case with such creations, no special provision seems to be made for doing the rough manual work of life, and, indeed, the problem—the labour question—is shirked. Some of the customs obtaining in Another World are instructive enough, such as their mode of slaughtering animals. The doomed animal, it appears—

'Is placed in a large lighted stable, over which is a loft, communicating with it by means of a grating. In this a man is stationed, who thrusts through the grating a long stick baited with a bunch of fresh grass, in the middle of which is contained a small globule endowed with the property of depriving the animal of all consciousness and sense of feeling. As soon as the beast has eaten the grass, and consequently eaten the pill, he staggers and falls; and before he has time to recover, the butcher despatches him by cutting his throat and letting out the blood, whereupon he dies a painless death, without a struggle. Only one animal is despatched at a time in the same stable, so that one does not see another killed.'

"For the mode of producing 'flying children' or of 'rearing hippopotami,' we must refer the curious reader to the book itself; nor have we time to dwell on the odd characteristics of preparing for marriage and of wedded life. We are inclined to think that, on the whole, our actual world, notably in such arrangements as these, is not inferior to Another World."

The writer of the foregoing should be informed that the editor of Another World makes no pretence whatever to have composed an imaginative fiction, or to have set down anything but that which, through means he may some day or other be disposed to communicate, he knows to be absolute truths. Moreover, "Hermes" has very much more to say, and only awaits the proper time to say it. That he will say it with the same candour, outspokenness, and genuine enthusiasm which he has told us the many interesting facts we already possess, may be accepted as certain. But he knows best when the time will be ripe for his disclosures. He has already divulged much of which advantage might be taken in this world of ours, and divulged it in language of such simple and persuasive eloquence that we feel bound to put implicit faith in every word he utters. Would that things among us could be as things are in the Star City of Montalluyah; we should be all the better for it—not only in the matter of painlessly slaughtering beasts for our provision, nor in that of the easy transition of man from life to death, but for the eternal happiness to which we all aspire. If the editor cannot precisely exclaim with Lucretius which Montaigne translates, "Mais ces traits si légers suffiront à un esprit pénétrant pour deviner le reste," he can at least say, with a firm conviction of the truths he has partially revealed:—"I have told you thus much, and if you receive what I have told you seriously and in good faith I can and will tell you a great deal more." To treat Another World as if it was a mere fantastic invention, a play of imagination, or, worst of all, a satire, is absurd. Either we must believe that "Hermes" discourses of facts, his knowledge of which (how obtained we must wait until he may think fit to enlighten us) is unquestionable, or we must reject his book altogether. And yet what a pity to scout, as "Utopian," such a beneficent rule as that of the great "Tootmanyosol!" If only we could ponder it thoughtfully, and profit by it actively, we should surely reap a golden harvest. Proteus says to Menelaus in one of the most famous Dialogues of Lucan: "Why should you be so surprised, Menelaus?—it is not a whit stranger than true." But the revelations of "Hermes" are far more suggestive, curious, and significative than the transformations of Proteus.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE entertainment to the Shah at the Royal Albert Hall was ot a very diversified nature. First the Shah got a glimpse of that pecular western institution the ultimate achievement of which is bewilderment and headache. We refer, of course, to the International Exhibition. His Persian Majesty saw machinery, pictures, and various productions in the "dry goods" line. Whether he looked upon these things with the "intelligent interest" of the reporters we are not able to say, but he was so late in entering the Hall that we will venture to assume his lingering among the bottled sweets of the "upper west quadrant." In the Hall itself a much finer exhibition awaited him—an exhibition of Clothes—a gorgeous illustration of what tailors and milliners can do for humanity. How we could have wished for the presence of Mr. Carlyle's Clothes Philosopher, Dr. Teufelsdröck. The sight would have inspired him to the production of materials for another chapter in Sartor Resartus, and formed the text of one of his most serious homilies. The Professor never saw anything like it in his prosy German experiences—never could have imagined so many thousands in such a Hall, clothed with such varied hues, such diamonds, stars, garters, orders, ribands, swords, velvets, ruffs, silk stockings, and what not besides. It was the apotheosis of Clothes, and Mr. Poole, as representative of the clothing art, should have been then and there hoisted to the pedestal of the Albert Memorial as a greater, if not a better, than the "Great and Good." Hence, O Clothes Philosopher! with the horrid suggestion of what might have happened had every scrap of clothes miraculously vanished from the splendid scene, and left nothing but so many "forked radishes." The idea befits thy cynical humour, but it must not be mentioned here. Great goodness! some one will presently ask what the Shah would be worth without his diamonds!

A GREAT compliment is paid to the universality of the musical instinct when it is taken for granted that every civilised, semi-barbarous, or wholly savage potentate that visits England loves the "divine art," and plenty of it. No matter whether our guest be an Emperor of the French, or a Cham of Tartary, we insist that, like the Old Lady at Banbury Cross, he should have music wherever he goes. In fact, music becomes the chief expression of the nation's welcome. We frantically hunt up Tartarean tunes; we puzzle our brains to find harmonies for them, which never fit; we set our verse-makers to work at Odes full of praises which everybody reads or sings with his tongue in his cheek; we write Tartarean Marches, quadrilles, and pièces de salon, wherewith to catch a penny and be in the fashion at one and the same time; and generally we harness the "heavenly maid" to the earthly potentate's wheel as the noblest feature in his "triumph." Against all this we have nothing to say. It is a harmless form of human activity, which profits some people, and pleases more. By all means, then, let it go on. But nobody thinks of the poor visitor in whose honour we evoke the Muses. Nobody takes the trouble to ask the Cham what he thinks of our music, or ascertain whether it be torture or delight to his Asiatic ears. This is a decided oversight. The highest duty of a host is to please his guest, and he is not qualified to entertain until he knows something of the "purtikler wanities" of the entertained. Of course it might be said, as it has been said relative to the Shah—"Our visitor comes to see us as we are, and not in masquerade, as we usually are not." Very good; then let us do nothing beyond that we usually do. Let us go about our respective businesses, and permit the curious guest to watch us at his leisure. This would be carrying the argument to its logical issue. But when we get up entertainments and spectacles in the stranger's honour the assumption is that we want to please him, and not to show him that which pleases us.

DR. FERDINAND HILLER, one of the greatest of living German musicians, has been among us for some weeks, but has had no opportunity of any importance of making himself heard in public. This, however, was entirely his own fault. His magnificent quintet in G, for the pianoforte with stringed instruments, so admirably played by Mr. Hallé and his associates at one of the last "Recitals," will alone suffice to commemorate his visit.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MR. ALBERT GILBERT AND MADAME GILBERT gave the second of the series of their interesting concerts (designated "The Classics of the Pianoforte"), at St. George's Hall, last Saturday. The programme contained many and varied novelties. Mr. Gilbert, in conjunction with Herr Straus and Signor Pezze, gave an artistic rendering of Beethoven's grand trio in B flat (Op. 97), and the same composer's trio in E flat (Op. 1). Mr. Gilbert also played, as a solo, Handel's "Troisième suite de pieces," in D, executing all the movements capitally. Herr Straus, in Molique's Saltarello, played with the finish and skill that has long ranked him one of our ablest performers on the violin. Signor Pezze played a solo on the violoncello, and a Sonata Sesta in G minor, by Benedetto Marcello (who flourished over a century back). Its quaint style, together with the performance of Signor Pezze, gave it a peculiar interest to many present. Madame Gilbert and Miss S. Cole sang Mendelssohn's "In His hands" (the 95th Psalm), with much fervour. The former also gave Cherubini's "Ave Maria;" the latter, Mr. George Macfarren's "The beating of my own heart." Both artists were much applauded. Mdlle. Helene Arnim sang two of Schumann's Lieder in her usual excellent manner. Mr. Percy Rivers gave a song by Schubert; and Mr. Richard Latter, in Mozart's "Mentre ti lascio," was favourably received. Mr. Charles Edward Stephens was the accompanist to both solo instrumentalists and singers, and he performed his task to perfection.

MR. OTTO BOOTH gave the fourth and fifth of his series of Six Chamber Concerts, on June 19th and 26th, in St. George's Hall. At the former he gave, with his coadjutors, Messrs. Dando, Richard Blagrove, and Pezze, a faithful interpretation of Haydn's Quartet in C, (Op. 7), and Beethoven's Quartet in G, No. 2, both receiving great applause; Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, the pianoforte part well played by Mr. H. Parker, was also effectively given. Mr. Otto Booth played, as his solo, Tartini's "La Fille du Diable." The vocalists were Mdlle. Helene Arnim and Mr. Chaplin Henry. The former displayed her contralto voice in a song of Mr. Booth's and one of Schumann's; the latter sang "The Fisher," by Mr. Otto Booth, and Wallace's "Bellringer." At the concert on the 26th the quartets were Mozart's in A (No. 5), Haydn's in G (Op. 12), by the same artists. Schubert's Trio in B flat was also played, with Herr Jules Sprenzer at the pianoforte, and received every justice. Mr. Otto Booth gave Handel's Violin Sonata in A, with his usual care. Miss Purdy, the young and rising contralto, sang "Autumn Leaflets" and a song of Niedermeyer's in capital style. Mr. Albert James gave "The Message," and Ascher's popular romance, "Alice, where art thou?"—receiving for the latter a loud encore. Mr. Henry Parker accompanied the vocal music and solos with his usual judgment.

GROSVENOR HOUSE.—Under the patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Duchess of Teck, with the Marchioness of Westminster and other distinguished personages, a concert, by permission of the Marquis of Westminster, was given at this noble mansion on behalf of the building fund for the Children's Convalescent Home, at Rhyl, North Wales, in presence of a numerous and fashionable assembly. This institution is, we are informed, "open to children from all parts of the country." Further, it is stated, that "the purchase, enlargement, and fitting up of the new premises will require nearly 4,000*l*., towards which the treasurers have already received about 2,500*l*., leaving 1,500*l*. to be provided. The cause is good, and there can be little doubt that the balance will be readily forthcoming. The programme, selected by Mr. Brinley Richards, who consented to preside on the occasion, was varied and excellent, as might have been expected from him. It included both vocal and instrumental music, the former comprising choruses and songs, the latter solos for the pianoforte, by Mr. Brinley Richards; harp, by Mr. John Thomas—both high authorities in all that concerns the music of Wales—and violin, by Mdlle. Friese. The members of the chorus were from the Royal Academy of Music, chiefly pupils of Signor Randegger, who directed their performances, which chiefly consisted of compositions or arrangements by Mr. Brinley Richards—among others, "The men of Harlech," and, as a wind up, "God bless the Prince of Wales." The solo singers were Misses Edith Wynne, Sophie Ferrari and Marie Davies, Messrs. Henry Guy, Wadmore, and Pope. To these were assigned a variety of ballads, &c., all more or less interesting. Miss Edith Wynne had two; Miss Sophie Ferrari had two; Mr. Henry Guy had two; and Miss Mary Davies had a Welsh national air, like the last piece allotted to Miss Wynne—"Eos Cymru," as all the accomplished lady's admirers are aware, There was also an Italian opera quartet for the other singers we have named. The accompanist-in-general at the pianoforte was Mr. Edwin Bending, but Mr. Richards was Miss Wynne's associate in the Welsh air, "Y Deryn pur." The circumstances under which the aid of these able and well-known artists was gratuitously lent would render criticism ungracious. Happily there was no occasion for criticism, as all went admirably. In short the entertainment was legitimately entertaining.

Miss Amy Stewart, a young pianist, and pupil of Herr Sauerbrey, gave, on Saturday last, an evening concert in the Beethoven Rooms, which was well attended. Miss Amy Stewart has every element of a good pianist, but she must work hard. She gave a concert reading of Beethoven's sonata, Op. 24, for violin and pianoforte, with Mr. Otto Booth, the same composer's "Sonata Pathetique" for piano solo, Chopin's "Valse brillante" (Op. 34), and her master's "Paraphrase de Concert," Loreley, in all of which she exhibited a good touch and genuine expression. Madame Sauerbrey sang "O mio Fernando," and Eisoldt's pretty spinning song, "The snapped thread," receiving much and deserved applause. Miss Catherine Poyntz gave a song by M. Buccalossi, and one from the opera of Betly—the latter encored. Mr. Pearson, in Benedict's "Eily Mavourneen," and Donizetti's "Di Pescatore," displayed a capital tenor voice. Mr. Maybrick gave "The Trooper," and "True to the last," with his usual judgment; and Herr Hugo, in a song by Boieldieu, and another by A. Müller, proved beyond doubt, his possession of a voice of great power and extended compass. Mr. Otto Booth played a brilliant solo on the violin by Leonard. Herr Sauerbrey accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

Messrs. Charles and Arthur Le Jeune, in conjunction with their father, Mr. C. W. Le Jeune, gave the third of their "Recitals" on Friday, the 27th ult., in the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, with decided success. The programme was interspersed with several interesting pianoforte, organ, and vocal pieces, together with three "Orchestral combination" pieces, which gave infinite satisfaction to all present. Mr. Charles Le Jeune played an organ solo of his own writing and an arrangement of Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry," receiving loud applause for his talented performance, as well as for two solos of his own composition. His brother, Arthur, played a march in D, on the organ, a pianoforte solo, "La Naïveté" (both composed by himself), and Thalberg's Fantaisie on L'Elisir d'Amore, in all of which he showed talent both as a composer and an executant. The performance of the three Messrs. Le Jeune, in the "Orchestral combination," was well received by the audience, who evinced their satisfaction by loudly re-demanding each piece. Mdlle Helene Arnim, in Gluck's "Che farò," and Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht," and "Sonnenshein," created a marked effect on the audience; as did Mr. Pyatt, the possessor of a capital bass voice, of good quality and extensive range, exemplified in Schubert's song of "The wanderer," and the late Willoughby Weiss's "Village Blacksmith." Mr. Charles E. Stephens accompanied the vocal music with judgment and care.

Her Majesty's Opera House was on Friday week, the scene of a grand concert given by Prince Poniatowski, whose name and attainments drew together a large and fashionable audience. The programme, moreover, was an unusually attractive one, containing the names of Mesdames Tietjens, Nilsson, and Trebelli, and MM. Campanini, Capoul, Rota, and Rocca. The first part of the concert was entirely devoted to a selection from the Mass in F of Prince Poniatowski, a work of sound merit, written in accordance with the best traditions in that class of composition, and listened to on this occasion with evident signs of appreciation. The second part of the selection was, however, from its variety and excellence of the pieces, no less than the brilliant rendering they received, an undoubted relief after the serious strains of the mass. The most effective items were the scene from Der Freischütz, sung in English by Mdlle. Tietjens; a romance of Herold's "Un Robe legère," rendered by M. Capoul in his most finished style; and the trio, "Le faccio un inchino," from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, all three of which were demanded a second time. Two songs by Prince Poniatowski—"Margarita," sung by Signor Rizelli," and the "Flower Girl," assigned to Mdme. Nilsson—were also received with considerable favour. An excellent orchestra contributed its aid to render the concert one of the most brilliant of the season.

St. George's Hall.—The entertainment given at St. George's Hall, on Monday afternoon, in the names of Mdlle. Marie Dumas and M. Jules Lefort might have been shorter with advantage. A mistake was made by the clever bénéficiaires, who evidently imagined the need to supplement their own performances with a lot of ordinary morning concert doings. No such need existed. Had the programme contained only the piquant and characteristic French dramatic scenes of Mdlle. Dumas and the equally piquant and characteristic chansons of M. Lefort, with, perhaps, by way of variety, a selection from the Gavottes, Rondeaus, and Bourées of the last century, the result would have been an entertainment altogether sui generis and altogether enjoyable. But we must not complain, seeing how often both Mdlle. Dumas and Mr. Lefort appeared, and how successfully they did their work. The lady was at her best in Stell's "Une Tempête sous un Cache Peigne," and in a monologue entitled "Le Jour de l'An de la Comédienne," as, also, in a French version of a Caudle Lecture. Nothing could have been happier than the choice of these sketches, which enabled the cultivated artist to exhibit not only her rare finesse, but also her clear perception and expression of character. Even those who could not understand a word that fell from the lips of Mdlle. Dumas must have so "heard with their eyes" as to follow all she did with interest and admiration. As regards M. Lefort, he may be said to have excelled himself. The able French vocalist was set down for no fewer than ten of his most admired songs, and all ten were given with that perfection of style which satisfies the most exigent taste. It is hard to particularise when all is equally good, but if we must do so then we select to mention for special praise M. Lefort's rendering of Quidant's "Ma barque," and Gounod's serenade, "Chantez, ma belle." But, as a matter of fact, the artist's entire performance was an effort as rare in its merit as in the demand it made upon his resources. How much M. Lefort was applauded and how often recalled there is no need to tell. The bénéficiaires were assisted by Miss José Sherrington—who sang a very superior sacred song, "Sun of my soul," by Grace Sherrington—Miss Purdy, Mdlle. Castellan, Madame Lancia, MM. Paque, Rizelli, Tito Mattei, and others, and facile princeps among the accompanists was Herr Wilhelm Ganz.

Mr. Wilford Morgan's Concert.—In the days when a good tenor singer is as much a rara avis as the bird of sable plumage, it is pleasant to be able to cite in one of our native singers an instance in which the prestige of our countrymen is maintained. In Mr. Wilford Morgan we possess a vigorous tenore robusto, who unites to this talent that of a composer, he having written several pretty and thoroughly English ballads. Mr. Morgan is, therefore, the right man in the right place at a ballad concert such as he gave on Monday week at Exeter Hall. The songs contributed by the entrepreneur were Sullivan's "Once again," delivered with considerable taste and feeling; his own ballad, "My sweetheart when a boy;" and Sam Lover's "How to ask and have," given with much humour. Mr. Winn displayed his voice and skill in Prince Poniatowski's "Yeoman's wedding" and the old sea song, "The mermaid;" and Miss Edith Wynne sang Clay's pathetic ballad, "She wandered down the mountain side," exquisitely, and was rewarded with an encore for Molloy's naïve little composition, "So the story goes." Miss Emily Mott, a rising young singer, sang Hatton's "Voice of the western wind" and "Thady O'Flynn" with ability; Miss Banks favoured with Ganz's "Sing, sweet bird," and "Comin' thro' the rye;" and Signor Tito Mattei and Mr. Aptommas performed upon their respective instruments, pianoforte and harp. The Quaver Glee Union assisted with some part songs.

The Misses Sherrington gave a matinée musicale, in Portland Place, last Saturday, and were favoured by a large and fashionable audience. Miss Josephine Sherrington, whose voice resembles her distinguished sister's, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, in its beautiful quality and extraordinary flexibility, sang several morceaux with marked success, especially a charming song by her sister, Miss Grace Sherrington. Miss Josephine also joined Signor Rizzelli and M. Jules Lefort in Adolph Adam's once popular trio, "Ah! vous dirai-je maman," in which her facility of execution was prominently brought into notice; and her sister, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, in a duet by the Abbe Clari, a composer who flourished some three centuries back. Mdme. Lemmens, besides the duet we have named, sang one with M. Jules Lefort, from Paer's Le Maitre de Chapelle, in which both artists were heard to infinite advantage, both as vocalists and comedians. Signors Rizelli, Monari Rocca, and Naudin contributed severally to the gratification of their audience by their clever singing; and Signor Foli, in Signor Pinsuti's popular song of "The Raft," came in for a large share of applause. M. Cros St. Ange (violoncello) and Signor Rendano (pianoforte) were the instrumentalists, and the vocal music was cleverly accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Grace Sherrington.

Mr. Edward Hollands, a young baritone, who has lately returned from Italy, gave a matinée on Wednesday, at 45, Wimpole Street. Mr. Holland displayed his voice to much advantage in Verdi's aria, "Alla vita," and Donizetti's "A tanto amor," and (with Mr. Maas) in the duet "Sul' campo della gloria." Randegger's trio, "I Naviganti," was effectively rendered by Miss Dora Hope, Messrs. Cobham and Stevens. Miss Hope sang remarkably well "Ombra Adorata," and, with Mr. Trelawny Cobham, a duet from Trovatore. The latter gave "Dalla sua pace" in a manner that gained him an encore. Miss Auguste Roche gave the page's song from The Huguenots, and was recalled. Miss Agnes Drummond, MM. Edouard, Daniel, and Stevens sang several songs and duets, and Signor Tito Mattei gave two of his effective solos on the pianoforte. Signor Li Calsi accompanied the vocal music.

A very full audience attended the concert given in Willis's rooms, on Monday afternoon, by the clever young pianist, M. Henri Logé. The bénéficiaire was well supported, and the entertainment had diversified attractions, but the performances of M. Logé himself took precedence of all others, not only as a matter of courtesy, but as a matter of right. Modestly enough, M. Logé chose to open the proceedings with the andante and finale from Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata.

The modesty was pleasant to see; nevertheless, such music should not have been played, and played so well, at a time when late comers prevented its due appreciation. In spite of distractions, however, the fact was made clear that M. Logé's ability as an interpreter of strictly classical music entitles him to a place among the élite of his profession. He subsequently performed two solos by Chopin, Mendelssohn's Capriccio (No. 2), Dupont's "Danse des Ombres," and Liszt's "Raphsodie alla Zingarese." These selections were varied enough fully to test his powers, and it is only just to say that the young artist "passed" with honours. That nothing remains for him to do in the matter of improvement cannot, of course, be asserted, but years and experience will, undoubtedly, supply all that is now wanting to completeness. M. Logé was assisted by Madame Corani—whose excellent rendering of Randegger's "Marinella" obtained for her a recall—Madame De Gurieff, Herr Werrenrath, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, Signor Franceschi, and Signor Gardoni, who sang "La Mandolinata" as he only can. M. Paque played a Fantaisie for violoncello, from his own pen, with much acceptance.

Mr. John Thomas (the accomplished Harpist to the Queen) gave a morning concert at the residence of the Marquis of Downshire, 24, Belgrave Square, which was fully and fashionably attended. Several compositions by the concert-giver were introduced on the occasion. Mr. Thomas and Mr. Wright commenced the concert by performing Mr. Thomas's grand duet in E flat minor for two harps, each movement of which was loudly applauded. Mr. Thomas also played his duet for harp and pianoforte on airs from La Favorita (with Mr. W. G. Cusins), a selection from his harp studies, his arrangement of two of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte and of some Welsh melodies, in all of which he received great and deserved applause. Miss Edith Wynne sang charmingly a new song, "Love at sea," by Sir Julius Benedict, which met with a very favourable reception, and was loudly encored. Mdme. Nita Gaetano, in some Spanish songs and an aria by Vaccaj (Romeo e Giulietta), evidently pleased her audience. Madame Patey, in a song by the late Vincent Wallace, gained a unanimous recall; and Mdlle. Elene Angèle sang "Marguerite," by Mr. Cowen, effectively. Mr. Vernon Rigby, in "Salve dimora;" Mr. Lewis Thomas, in "Home and Love;" Signor Gardoni (who never sang better), in "Mandolinata;" and M. Jules Lefort, in a song by Bordese, delighted all present. Mdlle. Theresa Castellan gave a brilliant solo on the violin, and Mr. W. G. Cusins, in piano solos by Chopin, gave much gratification to all present. Sir Julius Benedict, Signor C. Pinsuti and Mr. W. H. Thomas were the accompanists.

A very interesting musical entertainment was given recently by the pupils of the London Society for teaching the Blind, Upper Avenue Road, Regent's Park. The society is doing excellent work in every department of its labours, but most of all, perhaps, in that of music, thanks to the aptitude of the poor students and the ability of their instructor, Mr. Edward Barnes, who for sixteen years has discharged his duties with conspicuous success. That Mr. Barnes's teaching is of a high order may be gathered from the fact that the pupils have already performed Elijah, the Creation, the Messiah, and other kindred works, so as to give unqualified satisfaction. The same result attended the production lately of Sullivan's Prodigal Son, all the choruses in which —and all are not easy—were rendered with a precision and taste really surprising. A good choice of soloists had been made; Miss M. A. Condon, Miss Esther Stevens, Mr. G. Matthews, and Mr. Edward Long acquitting themselves with an intelligence which showed that good teaching had been brought to bear upon innate musical ability. Special praise was deserved by Mr. Long, who, both in the oratorio and to the selection following it, sang admirably. Among the noteworthy features of the second part were a performance, by Mr. Alfred Short, of two movements from Beethoven's sonata (Op. 79), and, by the choir, of Macfarren's capital part song, "The Three Fishers." But, generally, the whole entertainment was a success, and must have delighted all present, from the chairman, Sir Thomas Gladstone, down to the least cultivated. Another concert will be given on July 28, and if any of our readers wish to combine enjoyment with an opportunity for supporting a noble institution that stands in need of help, they cannot do better than attend on the occasion.

By the death of Mr. J. F. Puttick, the auctioneer, the Sacred Harmonic Society has lost one of its earliest and most active supporters. Mr. Puttick had for many years been identified with the management of the Society as one of its directors, and more recently, on the death of Mr. Hill, he became its honorary secretary, while he was also chiefly instrumental in founding the Benevolent Society, which has been most useful to the members. In former years Mr. Puttick was engaged as a newspaper reporter in the House of Commons.

PROVINCIAL.

Cork.—A concert was given on Monday, in the Munster Hall, by Mrs. Adolphe Fitzpatrick, a young and clever vocalist, lately returned from the United States. Mrs. Fitzpatrick possesses a soprano voice of the best and most sympathetic description, which she fully proved before an audience of some 1,500 or 2,000 persons, who applauded her to the echo. She sang a cavatina by Millard, "Waiting," the Irish melody of "The Harp that once thro' Tara's Halls;" and, with Mr. E. O'Mahony, the late Vincent Wallace's duet, "Of fairy wand" (Maritana); and, with Mr. H. Baker, the duet, "I saw from the beach," in all of which she roused the audience to enthusiasm, and was encored after each. Mr. Baker gave an artistic rendering of "Alice, where art thou?" and was loudly applauded. Mr. O'Mahony, in Verdi's "Eri tu" and Moore's "Bard's Legacy," sang with feeling and taste. Mr. Charles Malcolm, the pianist, played in a brilliant manner Liszt's "Don Juan" and "Wehli's "Home, Sweet Home." Mr. John Keenan, from America, recited Major Sigourney's poem, "Beautiful Snow," and Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade." Mrs. A. Fitzpatrick, it is rumoured, is engaged at one of the leading theatres for the autumn, to play in opera bouffe; she is young, clever, and handsome, and sure to make a hit.

Brighton.—There was a numerous, fashionable, and appreciative audience at the Aquarium Concert last Saturday afternoon. Madame Patey, who was the special attraction, was warmly greeted, and her singing gave the greatest satisfaction and delight.—The band of the Queen's Bays played on Wednesday afternoon. Very attractive arrangements have been made for this day, Saturday. Mdlle. Berthier (from La Scala, Milan) and Herr Nordblom will both take part in the Promenade Concert. There is to be a performance of sacred music to-morrow and each Sunday evening.—On Monday evening a new service of sacred song illustrative of "The Creation," was given, for the first time, in the Music Room of the Pavilion. Despite the very wet weather—says the Brighton Guardian—there was a good audience; and those who braved the downpour of rain to visit the Pavilion were well repaid for the exertion. The new service has been compiled by the Rev. J. Wilkins, Minister of Queen's Square Baptist Chapel, and it is only another of the many efforts which have been made by that gentleman to advance the popularity of sacred song. The choral portion of the service was rendered by a number of Sunday School senior scholars, who completely filled the orchestra; and the connective readings were given by the Revs. R. Hamilton, A. D. Spong, and Dr. Winslow. Mr. A. Habens was the conductor. Attention and care were manifested on the part of the choir, and pains and perseverance on the part of the conductor. Mr. C. T. West presided at the organ with his usual ability.

APHORISMS.

Translated from Schumann by Walter E. Lawson.

Thou must invent new and vigorous melodies!

"It has pleased," or "it has not pleased," the people say, as if there were no higher aim in art than the pleasure of the people!

To send light into the depths of the human heart is the vocation of the artist.

No one is able to do more than he understands.
No one understands more than he is able to do.*

He who in literature is not acquainted with the more important works of his day is accounted uneducated. In music we ought to be equally advanced.

That which has cost artists days, months, years of thought, the dilettanti think to comprehend in a moment.

Milan.—Signor Pedrotti's opera, Olema, la Schiava, book by Signor P. M. Piave, has been produced at the Teatro dal Verme; but, though its composer was called on some twenty times, it will probably not achieve a very long run. It contains some few fine specimens of composition, such as the duet between Olema and Don Philip of Austria, the romance of the soprano, "Tutta tremai quel primo dì," in the third act, and the final trio; as a whole, however, it failed to move the audience—the real audience, as distinguished from the composer's friends—to anything like enthusiasm. The principal artists were Signora Galletti, Signora Teresina Ferni, Signori Aldalghieri, Augusti and Lombardelli.—At the Teatro Manzoni, the season was brought to a close with Neida, by Herr von Flotow, and Il Viandante, by the Duke Litta.—The Municipality have accepted Signori Brunello and Cattaneo as managers of the Scala.

* This is a forced and incorrect antithesis.—Ed.

THE 150th ANNIVERSARY OF THE ORGAN BUILT BY JOHANN JOACHIM WAGNER, FOR THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY, AT BERLIN..

Not long ago an interesting ceremony took place in the Church of St. Mary, at Berlin, with regard to the organ built by John Joachim Wagner, in 1723, who was a highly-renowned artist in the construction of church organs. Such a ceremony deserves imitation when and wherever an occasion presents itself. The commemoration shows the respect and acknowledgment with which the builder and his work are still appreciated, not only by the authorities and the members of the church, after such a length of time, but by the public in general. How many may have been inspired and elevated to religious feelings by its solemn tones while attending Divine service? How many borne down by grief may have been soothed and comforted by listening to its enlivening voice, and have gathered hope and encouragement for the future? How many may have united in the joyful chorus of praise to the Almighty for the manifold bounties and tokens of grace they have thankfully received under its guidance? And how many may have listened with delight to the artistic performances of great musicians interpreting the greatest master-works written for the instrument, from its erection 150 years ago up to the present time?

The next celebration of a similar kind will take place in 1875 in the Garnison Kirche (Military Church), at Berlin. The organ for that Church was also built by Wagner in 1725. He lived in the first half of the last century, and was considered one of the best organ manufacturers at that time. His domicile was in Berlin, for which town he built numerous organs. The disposition of the above mentioned organ in the church of St. Mary counts 40 stops, 3 manuals, and pedal, worked by six bellows. In the Garnison Kirche (Military Church) the organ has 51 stops. Other works of his are:—The organ in the Parochial Church, erected in 1730, which is particularly remarkable for its vigorous and sumptuous tone. It has 32 stops, 2 manuals, and pedal, and is worked by five bellows, and its bass parts are exceedingly fine. The organ in the church in Jerusalem Street, which originally belonged to the Military Church at Potsdam, was presented by King Frederick William the First of Prussia, in 1730, to the first-mentioned church. Other organs of his construction are in the French Church, situated in the Kloster-Strasse; in the Frederick Hospital, and one in the Military Church at Potsdam. In nearly all the old churches at Berlin the organs are built by him, and are admired for their clever construction and splendid tone.

In concluding this narrative it may not be out of place to observe that our organ-builders are not so sufficiently honoured and estimated as they deserve to be, considering the merit of their artistic productions. Many of the public look upon an organ as a quantity of wooden and metal pipes arranged in rows and worked by wind or steam, without knowing or even thinking what an amount of knowledge and ability the organ-builder must possess and become master of before he is able to produce an instrument of so complicated a construction. He must not only, for the technical part of it, be a perfect carpenter and worker in zinc and other metals, but he requires to be well up in the rules of lever, versed in acoustics and mathematics, must have a well-trained ear to voice the pipes for the different stops, and, consequently, be able to tune the whole instrument accurately and give the many different registers the proper characteristic colours in sounds, and bring the whole work into complete harmony, not to mention a great many other particulars.

It would be a most deserving undertaking if some one versed theoretically and practically would give some lectures on the construction of this wonderful instrument for the benefit of the public and our future organists. Why have our lately-formed societies for promoting the art and science of music not taken in hand this subject instead of rivaling societies long established before them?—We appeal for this purpose to the Honourable College of Organists, who have done so much for our future organ-players by raising good taste and abilities for the performances on the King of Instruments. Let them take the subject into consideration, if they have not already done so, and they will add to their great endeavours of spreading knowledge, and also to the circle of organists a new branch, extending it to the examination of the student in obtaining the diploma, and for the information of those amateurs who wish for instruction on the subject.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

June 25, 1873.

The concerts, four times a-week at the Etablissement, seem to be "going" very well, and attract more and more visitors each time. I have no need to criticise any of them this week, but to record the performance of one pièce de resistance on Friday last, in the programme, "Fragment de Symphonie," better known as Haydn's Ninth (Imperial) Symphony, the andante movement being the Fragment. It was deliciously played and thoroughly appreciated, and, at its conclusion, met with quite a round of applause.

To-day the valse of Ettling, "La Fille de Mdme. Angot," makes a first appearance. The opera season, as I informed you last week, commences on Tuesday with Faust. The engagements at present are Mdmes. Telmard, Noalle, Céline May, Champenois, Descamps, Kinnel, Messieurs Bresson, Descamps, Ytrac, Larriveé, Kinnell, Cifoleli Lodève, Herbert, and Leburton. A chorus of 24, and band of 32, under the able direction of M. Champenon, with M. David as first violin, make up the company M. Clement Martino opens his season with.

On Monday (June 30) we are to have a treat in the shape of a comedy played by Brasseur and the Palais Royale Company of Paris. The play is La Cagnotte, 5 acts, by Labiche and Delacrois. Whether they will play a second time as an "off" night of the opera is as yet a mystery. In fact the telegram announcing their intentions only arrived this morning.

M. Millet, our tenor at the end of last season, has, I hear, got an engagement, while in Paris, with Signor Giacomelli, and is going to sing in Italy.

Boulogne is looking more gay every day, and visitors arrive fast. The sands now present a lively appearance. The bathing machines conduct people a short distance into the Manche to bathe, "en société," in costumes of various hues and fits; the gentlemen generally go in for stripes. (N.B.—Not above measure). There is also a new feature on the sands consisting of what may be likened to porter's hall chairs in basket-work, which are light and portable and let out at the rate of 2d. a day.—All the omnibuses have been painted and turned out to run all day long from the market to the Etablissement.

One more musical note before I close. Our only permitted blind organ-grinder has turned up again, so the season must be said to have begun.

July 2, 1873.

As I wrote last week, the season was to open on Monday at the Theatre, with Brasseur and the Palais Royale Company—and so it did. The house was crammed, and La Cagnotte was thoroughly appreciated; so much so that after the curtain had fallen for the last time, M. Brasseur came to the front and announced his intention of playing again to-night. By the bill of fare of to-day we may again anticipate a crowded house, and success in every way, for it consists of Le Misanthrope et l'Auvergnat, by MM. Labiche, Labize, and Siraudin; La Mariée de Mardi Gras, by M. Eugène Grangé and Lambert Phiboust; besides a chansonette, and a small comic scene, La Baptême du petit Leon, undertaken by M. Brasseur all alone.

The opera season began last night with Faust. As it was the first performance of a new company, orchestra, &c., I will say nothing about the individual artists till next week, but simply record the fact that the opera was a success, and the theatre was well attended. La Fille du Regiment to-morrow.

The out-door concert did not take place on Monday on account of the rain. One, under the direction of M. Panis, by "L'Harmonie Boulognaise," is announced for the 4th. The one on Monday was to have been by "La Société Musicale"—and, till quite lately, the latter, gave its name to both, but there has been a split, and "l'oiseau dit je suis l'Harmonie."

A new journal, entitled La Semaine Théatrale, is about to be published at Boulogne, with M. Ch. Quettier as editor.—Boulogne is getting fuller every day.

MDLLE. DESCLÉE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Mr. Editor,—Being in town for a few days, I thought I would look in at the French plays last night and see Victor Sardou's new comedy La Maison Neuve. I was much pleased, and think it one of his best pieces. He is very severe upon the "new ideas" of the young generation, as severe as you, Mr. Editor, are (most justly) upon the "new ideas" in music, as expounded by Messrs. Wagner, Liszt, and Co.; but what I wish to tell you more particularly is the profound impression made on me by Mdlle. Desclée. Here we have an actress who, for subtlety of conception and intense realism, has few rivals. Her conception of the character of Claire is a profound study and a marvellous piece of acting, and the fidelity and consistency is carried out to the end. Those who deny to Mdlle. Desclée powers of the highest order should go and see her in La Maison Neuve, and if they are not then convinced I shall be content to remain, dear Mr. Editor, for ever A Rustic.

July 3rd, 1873.

AN ITALIAN ON OPERATIC MUSIC IN FRANCE.

A correspondent of the Gazzetta Musicale di Milano says there are only two theatres in Paris where a composer of any reputation can have his works brought out properly: the Opera and the Opéra-Comique. There used to be the Théâtre Lyrique as well, but, since the Commune set fire to it, the little Athénée has taken its place. No master, however, who is well known, can possibly make up his mind to produce an opera in so small a house and with so limited an orchestra. The other theatres, or rather teatrini, give only buffo operas, operettas, parodies, and so on. There are, therefore, only the two already mentioned. How do they respond to the exigencies of the public and of art? The first, the Opera, restricts itself to giving a new score every year, and does not always give that. Last year, for instance, it gave none. This year it has given Le Roi de Thulé, which has only two acts. It adds, when it chooses, a ballet, and that is all. Is it possible to satisfy at this rate those composers who do not choose to write comic operas? Yet the Opera receives a Government grant of from 600 to 800 thousand francs annually. Nor must it be supposed that there is any deficiency of composers for this theatre. David, Thomas, Massé, Reyer, Vaucorbeil, Mermet, Membrée, &c., have each an opera cut and dried in their portfolio. What is there to prevent one being brought out? It must be stated, however, that if the manager decided this very day on producing one of their operas, it could not be performed before next year, seven or eight months' rehearsals being indispensable at the Opera.

Let us pass on to the other theatre. The Opéra-Comique has at length published its conditions, which have been accepted by the Society of Dramatic Authors and Composers. The Management binds itself to give every year ten acts (in Paris, it is usual to reckon by the number of acts), but, out of these, it reserves the right of producing three belonging to another theatre, and of giving every two years a translation. The novelties are, therefore, reduced to seven acts, since three are not new. This year, for instance, the Management has taken from the old Théâtre Lyrique Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, in five acts. Next year, it will take one in three, and so on. Of the seven acts remaining, three or four will, probably, be represented by little one-act comic operas, which are neither one thing nor the other, unless they are by a very clever composer, such as all Grisar's, Les Noces de Jeannette, by Victor Massé, and others of a similar kind. There would be, also, a real opera, in three or four acts, should there be only three operettas instead of four.

Well, this is not much; indeed, it is not enough, especially if we reflect that it is the Opéra-Comique which fosters more than any other theatre musical art in France. Young composers, and even composers who have had several operas performed, do not easily succeed in getting the doors of the Opera opened to them. They are, therefore, under the necessity of applying to the second musical theatre; but how is it possible, with only one opera, and three or four one-act operettas every year, to satisfy so many applicants? Nor can it be asserted that they will write for somewhere else. They write for Paris or not at all. A case like that of Pétrarque, produced at Marseilles, is exceedingly rare. The provincial cities do not give new operas; they live on the repertory of the Capital. And what is the contingent of the latter every year? It is soon reckoned up. At one of the two theatres, sometimes an opera and sometimes not; at the other, one opera necessarily; in addition to this, three or four one-act trifles. This is enough to employ four or five masters at most, and that only sparingly, because the majority would not be able to give more than an insignificant act each. What are the others to do? Write romances for albums and chamber music, or give singing or pianoforte lessons. Such is the work of the great mass of composers in France, notwithstanding a Conservatory, a competition for the Prix de Rome, and various professors of harmony and counterpoint selected by Government.

In Italy, a composer who cannot get a new opera produced at the Scala, will, at any rate, endeavour to have it brought out at the Pergola, the Fenice, the San Carlo, or some other of the great theatres in the principal cities, or even at a theatre, comparatively speaking, secondary. In France, this is not so; the lyrical tragedy which is not produced at the Opera cannot be given anywhere. I repeat that Pétrarque was an exception, and only proves the rule.

It is this which constitutes the evil. If the above were not an exceptional case, things would go on much better. Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, &c., might bring out new works, which, if crowned with success, might subsequently be performed in Paris. But no; no one can make up his mind to offer his work to a country theatre. It is true that, were he to do so, the country manager might not accept it, on the pretext that he was more sure of the success of Robert le Diable and of Les Huguenots than of any Pétrarque in the world.

Genoa.—The death of Angelo Mariani, the well-known conductor has created a very deep impression, for he was greatly and universally esteemed. At the request of the city of Ravenna, his remains were transported for interment to that place, and every lover of art here accompanied them to the railway station. The ceremony had no official character, but, despite this, all the leading authorities, political and municipal, such as the Prefect, the Syndic, the Questor, etc., took part in it. Signori Rossi and Faccio came on purpose from Parma and Milan respectively. Among the other persons present was Signor Serra, conductor at the Carlo Felice before Mariani. His advanced age—he is upwards of eighty—did not prevent him from paying the last tribute of respect to his successor. Signor F. Sanguineti, manager of the Carlo Felice, has commissioned Signor Santo Varni, the sculptor, to execute a bust of Mariani for the vestibule of the theatre.

Madrid.—The twelve members of the Section of Music lately created by a resolution of the Academy of Fine Arts are Hilarion Eslava, Emilio Arieto, Francisco Asenjo Barbieri, Jesus de Monasterio, Valentin Zubianere, Juan Quelbuza, Mariano Vasquez, Baltazar Saldoni, Rafael Hernandez, Antonio Romero, José Juzenga, and Antonio Maria Segovia.

Baden.—Mdme. Clara Schumann is stopping here. So also is Herr Niemann, who, it is said, intends making this his permanent residence.

Lines for Music.

FORGOTTEN.

I.

Forgotten are those lov'd days when we strayed,
Two happy children, by the river's brink;
When in the meadows green we oft had played,
And each its share of childhood's joys did drink;
When in the confidence of youthful love
Each other's troubles then imparted we,
And childlike homage gave to One above—
Forgotten are they all—though not by me.

II.

Forgotten is that hour when 'neath the trees
Thou asked and gained my foolish, trusting heart,
When love o'erflowing, there upon our knees
We vow'd, Heaven helping, never should we part.
How smiled the sun, how gay the brooklet laughed;
Too kind and good, thou then appeared to be—
How of each other's love the wealth we quaff'd—
Forgotten is that time, alas! by thee.

WAIFS.

Mdlle. Ilma di Murska—her engagement with Mr. Mapleson having expired—left London last week for Vienna, viâ Paris. She will, while at Paris, we are informed, study the part of Ophelia with the composer. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska positively goes to America next fall, to join the operatic company of Mr. Maretzek.

The celebrated pianist (the "Lion pianist," as he used to be called), Leopold de Meyer, is making a brief sojourn in London. He is playing more wonderfully than ever, say those who have heard him in private. Why are we forbidden to hear him in public?

Dublin University Choral Society.—A very excellent performance of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's romantic cantata, Lurline, took place on Tuesday last in Trinity College. A full band and chorus gave effect to this attractive composition, which was given for the first time in Ireland. The choruses went smoothly and like clock-work, thanks to the drilling of Sir Robert P. Stewart, conductor of the society. The second portion of the concert was of a miscellaneous description; an attractive vocal quartet by Sir Robert P. Stewart, "From visions sad awaking," was sung with effect, and was deservedly applauded. Mr. Hercules Macdonald, an amateur, gave Balfe's buffo aria from the Siege of Rochelle, "Travellers all," to the satisfaction of his friends present, and several instrumental pieces varied the programme. The hall was crowded to overflowing.

A Western genius has invented a steam fiddle.

Miss Therese Liebe has become a great favourite in Boston.

The Alcazar Theatre, at Marseilles, has been destroyed by fire.

Miss Alice Fairman will return to England during the summer.

A Wagner Society has been founded at Barcelona. Where next, and next?

Messrs. Nelson Varley and F. C. Packard have withdrawn from their New York engagements.

Fechter has sued Mr. Sherman, proprietor of the Lyceum Theatre, New York, for 412,000 dollars.

The Operahouse at Venice is still closed for want of an impresario. Where are the "enterprising" of that ilk?

A monument to the late Lefébure-Wély was solemnly "blessed," on Wednesday, in the chapel of Pére-la-Chaise.

London critics are huffy because Balfe's opera is announced under the foreign title of Il Talismano, instead of The Talisman.

Nilsson returns to Boston, Oct. 6th, her first appearance after her return from Europe being made here.—Dexter Smith.

A Mdlle. Blanche Dieudonné has been engaged by M. Strakosch. Let us hope that the lady will justify the name she bears.

Signor Vianesi had the honour of receiving an invitation to the Garden Party, from their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, to meet the Shah at Chiswick.

The festival of the parish choirs of the diocese of Oxford was held in the cathedral at Oxford on Tuesday. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, professor of music in the University.

The Prince George Royal Military Band of Saxony have just sailed from Hamburg for the United States, on a concert tour. The Germans of New York are preparing to give them a suitable reception.

A niece of Beethoven's is said to be living at Vienna in great distress. The French musicians are stirring themselves on her behalf. Of course, Vienna, which treats composers as Jerusalem treated prophets, would let her starve.

The band of the Fifeshire Artillery Volunteers have received notice from the War Office that their services will no longer be required, in consequence of their having accompanied the Fife and Clackmannan miner's demonstration at Perth.

There are rumours floating about the American musical world that Mr. Maurice Grau, who managed Rubinstein so successfully, intends forming an English Opera troupe, next season, with Mesdames Parepa-Rosa and Seguin, and Messrs. Castle and Karl for the principal artists.

A public meeting, in connection with the Welsh Choir Prize Fund, was held on Thursday night, in the lecture hall of the Literary Institution, Aldersgate Street. Mr. J. H. Pulleston occupied the chair; and, besides speeches from several Welsh gentlmen, there was a selection of national music under the direction of Mr. Brinley Richards.

The dispute between the Mayor of Boulogne-Sur-Mer and the late Directors of the Museum has resulted in the confirmation of the new directors appointed by him. As there are many English residents at Boulogne, and donors to the Museum, the Mayor wished England to be represented—and she is so now by M. Delattre, the manager of the General Steam Navigation Company, and by Dr. Sidney Chater.

One of our ministers recently announced the hymn as follows:—

"Page one hundred and thirty-three,
Nearer, my God, to Thee;
This being my favourite hymn,
Rise, and sing with all your vim."

The subjoined letter appears in the Ménéstrel:—

"Monsieur le Redacteur,—Permettez-moi de vous informer que les détails qu'on vous a donnés sur Henri Amsel, le ténor polonais, ne sont point corrects. Il n'est point entré au Conservatoire de Tavistock House, parce qu'il n'a pas voulu se soumettre aux règles et reculait devant la perspective de quatre heures de gammes tous les matins pendant deux ans, que j'impose à tous ceux qui veulent apprendre à chanter sous ma direction. M. Gounod n'a rien ou absolument à y voir. Je vous prie de croire à l'assurance de ma considération distinguée. "Georgina Weldon.

College of Organists.—The Midsummer Examination was held on the 26th ult., when the following gentlemen passed and obtained the College Diploma, viz.—Messrs. Joseph Bradley, of Staleybridge; R. J. Buckley, of Smethwick; Arthur Dyer, Mus. Bac., Oxon., of Weston-super-Mare; George F. Smith, of Newington Butts; R. H. Wilson, of Manchester; and J. G. Wrigley, of Blackpool. These gentlemen will be admitted to Fellowship in the College at the next meeting of the council. Certificates were also awarded to Messrs. W. Blakeley, of Wakefield; Henry Burrage, of Southsea; W. W. Galloway, of Preston; and W. H. Palmer, of Weston, who will be admitted as Associates. The rest of the candidates were referred to their studies for six months.

Royal Italian Opera.—The long announced version of Auber's Diamans de la Couronne was produced on Thursday night before one of the most crowded and brilliant audiences of the season. The chief parts were sustained by Mdme. Adelina Patti (Caterina), Mdlle. Monbelli (Diana), Signor Bettini (Enrico), Signor Tagliafico (Campo Mayor), and Signor Raguer (Mugnoz). In the character of the Queen of Portugal, Mdme. Patti added one more to her long list of triumphs. Signor Vianesi conducted.—During the performance a rumour that the Prince Poniatowski had died suddenly in the afternoon at his residence, was spread about the theatre, and subsequently confirmed on good authority A more familiar face in artistic circles could not be missed, nor a more universally popular man regretted.

Mr. Gye has received the following official communication from the Lord Chamberlain's office respecting the reception of His Majesty the Shah, and the entertainments provided on the occasion of the State performance at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden:—"Lord Chamberlain's Office, St. James's Palace, S.W., June 23, 1873.—Dear Sir: The Lord Chamberlain desires me to express to you his best thanks for the arrangements made for the visit of the Shah in State to the Royal Italian Opera, on Saturday evening, which resulted in a most successful and magnificent entertainment.—I remain, dear sir, your most obedient servant, Spencer Ponsonby.—F. Gye, Esq." At the conclusion of the performances on the evening in question, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales having presented Mr. Gye to the Shah, His Majesty personally expressed his great satisfaction with all the arrangements.

It can hardly be regarded as surprising that we have Indian wars, when we reflect how persistently the pale face deludes the untutored savage. There was Slimmer. Slimmer was a pedlar. On his way to the Pacific coast he stopped over night in a village belonging to the Shoshone Indians. Slimmer amused his entertainers in the evening by playing Kathleen Mavourneen upon an accordeon. When he had squeezed out the tune three or four hundred times the Shoshone chief told Slimmer he would give anything to possess such an instrument as that. Then a happy thought struck Slimmer. He had six hundred pairs of bellows which he was taking out to a settlement in Oregon, and without a quale of conscience he disposed of them on the spot to the chief at two hundred and fifty per cent. advance on the cost. That morning Slimmer left. For the next two days the chief remained at home, working one pair of bellows after another in a vain endeavour to evolve Kathleen Mavourneen from the nozles; and, when he had strained himself until he burst three or four blood-vessels, his wives took a hand. Then all the members of the tribe tried; and the medicine-man seized one pair and fled to the woods, and howled over it and screeched, and sat on a fence and worked the handles up and down until he fainted, but not a solitary note of Kathleen Mavourneen disturbed the impressive solitude of that vast wilderness. And they caught a white man and drove a stake through him, and built a bonfire on his bosom, and made him try; but even he failed to organize a concert upon the Mavourneen basis. And now, whenever you meet a Shoshone Indian anywhere he always asks if you know a man named Slimmer. They are looking for Slimmer. They want him. They want to lead him out to some retired spot and remove his cuticle, and chip him off little by little until they work down to his skeleton.

Mr. Oberthür, having recently been elected an "honorary member" of the Harper's Society, "David," of Prague, received from that corporation a most handsomely got up Diploma, a masterly specimen of illuminated caligraphy. The left side of the Diploma presents a drawing of "David" with his Harp in his regal state, beneath which is a fine view of Prague, with the coat of arms of the town; the right side containing the following inscription:—

Diplom,
Pán pan,
Charles Oberthür,
profesor Harfy na londýnské hudební Akademii.
Jest ode dne 26, února, 1873.
Cestným členem
Jednoty Harfeníku,
"DAVID."
V. Praze, dne 10, dubna, 1873.
Kaspar Pathe, Karel Häring,
Jednatel, Předseda.

Of which the following is a translation:—"Diploma, Charles Oberthür, Esq., Professor of the Harp at the London Academy of Music, has been elected honorary member of the Harper's Society, "David," on the 26th of February, 1873. Prague, April 10th, 1873."—This is the second diploma Mr. Oberthür has received from Prague, having previously been honoured with one from the Conservatory of Music, after his visit there some years ago. He is also in possession of a diploma from the Musical Society in Leyden (Holland), and from the Philharmonic Society in Munich.

PARMA.—Mdlle. Anna Carina has just concluded an exceptionally successful star engagement of two months at the National Theatre, to which she was, some years ago, regularly attached. She has appeared in Margarethe, Alice, Donna Anna, Elsa, Valentine, and other favourite parts, before houses crowded to the ceiling.

BOLOGNA.—According to persons who have heard her at private parties here, Signorina Erminia Borghi-Mamò seems likely to continue the fame acquired by her mother, Signora Borghi-Mamò. The young lady is to make her first appearance next winter at Nice.—A subscription has been opened for placing in the vestibule of the Teatro Comunale a bust of the lamented conductor, Angelo Mariani.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. # WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

PRESENTATION TO MR. HENRY FARMER.

(From the "Nottingham High Pavement Chronicle.")

Many friends of Mr. Henry Farmer, worshipping at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, recently expressed a desire to testify their sense of the beauty of the services he renders to them every Sunday, and their appreciation of the devotion which has led him to discharge the duties of organist for no less than thirty-five years. Mr. Farmer entered on this office when quite a boy; and no temptation has induced him to quit it since his great powers have been matured. The sum of £82 1s. 6d. was collected in about a fortnight, and was expended on a drawing-room clock with side ornaments, and a handsome silver cup, with suitable inscriptions. When it came to be discussed in what form the presentation should be made, Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Woodward invited all the subscribers and the whole of the choir to be their guests at the Mechanics' Lecture Hall, on Wednesday, June 11th, to meet Mr. Farmer. The choir accordingly mustered to the number of more than fifty, and the majority of the subscribers also attended. After tea the proceedings commenced with glees by the choir, songs by Miss Lowe, Miss Bartram, and Mr. Hugh; music by Miss Woodward, and an operatic selection by the High Pavement Amateur Band. After the musical programme had been gone through, the presentation to Mr. Farmer was made by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in an eloquent speech, highly flattering to Mr. Farmer, to which Mr. Farmer modestly and suitably replied. The inscription on the Testimonial was as follows:—

"The gift of the members of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, to Henry Farmer, Esq., in cordial recognition of his invaluable services as their organist during 35 years.—June 11*th*, 1873."

Among the various speeches on the the occasion, one from Mr. John Farmer (father of Mr. Henry Farmer), created more than ordinary interest:—

"Mr. John Farmer (father of Mr. Henry Farmer) having expressed a desire to say a few words, was very warmly received. He was indistinctly heard, but was understood to say that it had pleased the Almighty to preserve him to that time of life, his eighty-third year, to witness a ceremony which they might be sure was very gratifying to the feelings of an old father. He had watched the progress of his excellent son through life, and the little he (the speaker) had done for him had borne good fruit. He had won the respect and the regard of that congregation, meeting at the High Pavement, for which he had always felt the highest esteem. He thanked God that his son had carried out those precepts which he had endeavoured to instil, and had proved himself a good citizen, a firm friend, a good husband, a good father, and a most affectionate son to his father, John Farmer."

The proceedings, according to the High Pavement Chronicle, were altogether satisfactory. We, in London, who, for many years, have watched Mr. Farmer's career, may be permitted to add that a testimonial of esteem could not have been more worthily bestowed.

MENDELSSOHN SCHOLARSHIPS FOUNDATION.

The committee of the above fund held a meeting on Monday last, when the present holder of the Scholarship, Mr. William Shakespeare, was re-elected. We understand that most satisfactory accounts have been received from Milan of his musical progress. Although still occupying himself with composition and pianoforte playing, the two branches in which he displayed sufficient talent to gain the Scholarship, he is devoting his attention chiefly to the art of singing, receiving the highest encomiums and encouragement from his master, the celebrated Signor Lamperti. This is the third year of Mr. Shakespeare's tenure of the Scholarship.

At the same meeting, the following report from the sub-committee was brought up and passed:—

"Your Sub-Committee, believing that they have arrived at the end of their labours, and that no further endeavours on their part would produce any adequate results at the present time, beg leave to make their third and final report, as follows:—

"They have met, since November, eight times. The Hon. Secretaries have attended at the Office during the first few months almost daily, and latterly once or twice a week. The following written and printed matter has been issued by sanction of your Sub-Committee:—Letters to the Queen and Royal Family, to the Society of Arts and the President of the Royal Academy of Music, by the Chairman; many thousand Circulars and Letters to various Musical Societies, Deans and Chapters of Cathedrals, Professors and lovers of Musical Art, the Press, the Livery Companies of London; Lists of Donations, Reprints of Notices in the Papers, &c., &c., (including Statement of November 4th, 1872.)

"The total of donations amounts to 736*l*. 3s. The total amount of Expenditure is 150*l*. 10s. 2d. The balance has been paid into the Treasurer's Account at the Bank of England, ready for your instruction as to investment.

"An audited Balance Sheet follows herewith. Your Sub-Committee beg leave to recommend that this Balance Sheet, together with the Book of Donations, the Minute Book, &c., and some copies of each of the written and printed matter before alluded to, be deposited with the Society's records. In reference to the donations received, the Sub-Committee cannot disguise their disappointment at the small response which your appeal has met with from the Musical Societies and the Musical Profession in general, both in Great Britain and Ireland. Two or three donations only have come in from Musical Societies; but it is quite possible, that during the next Winter Season some Societies may give performances in favour of your Fund. There is a probability of co-operation to this effect on the part of the Directors of the Crystal Palace. From the Deans and Chapters the response has not been encouraging, notwithstanding a second letter having been addressed to them, which, in the opinion of your Sub-Committee, established a strong claim upon their support, and which produced several answers but no assistance. Your Sub-Committee are not without hope that one or other of the Livery Companies of London may follow the example set them by the Goldsmiths' Company.

"Since your last meeting, at which the suggestion respecting a performance of Elijah, made in our report then submitted, was negatived, the idea of giving a concert at a private house has been considered, but is laid aside for the present. You may feel inclined to entertain it subsequently, more particularly as Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Sims Reeves have kindly expressed their willingness to help in the matter, and you would, by setting the example, probably stimulate the zeal of Metropolitan and Country Societies to benefit the Fund.

"Your Sub-Committee beg gratefully to acknowledge the services of the Secretaries, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Mr. Arthur Sullivan, to whose labours in a great measure the success that has attended their efforts to increase the Funds of the Foundation may be attributed. They also desire to call your attention to the great benefit they have derived from Mr. George Wood's liberality, whereby they have obtained a temporary office in a central position, and other advantages free from every expense. Your Sub-Committee, impressed with the advantage they have had thus for a time conferred upon them, beg leave to call your serious attention to the necessity of providing a home for your records, books, &c., and to serve as a permanent place for the meeting of the Committee and the transaction of business. They venture to think that if, with this view, a connection by affiliation, or otherwise, with the University of London, or some Metropolitan Educational or learned Society, could be established, the working of your Society would be simplified, the object of the Foundation would become more widely known, and, at the same time, that liberty in the application of the Funds which has been exercised by the Committee from the first would be most easily maintained. With this recommendation, your Sub-Committee beg leave to hand back to you the powers conferred upon them. "JULIUS BENEDICT, Chairman.

"201, Regent Street, W., July 1*st*, 1873."

FIRST REPORT OF THE COUNCIL OF THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, 1872-73.

The Council of the Royal Albert Hall have the honour of reporting their proceedings during the year (or, rather, fifteen months) that they have been in office, to the General Meeting of the Corporation, called in accordance with Section 20 of the Constitution of the Corporation.

2. The Report of the Provisional Committee, which was laid before the first Meeting of the Corporation on the 25th March, 1872, stated that "the Committee have given their support to the following schemes, and they specially commended them to the care of the Corporation:—

"(a.) A Series of Cheap Concerts for the People.

"(b.) A Society of Amateurs of all Classes for Instrumental Music.

"(c.) A National Training School for Music."

Digitized by Google

They proceed to say—"The Committee have made arrangements for various other Concerts . . . and they have undertaken, on the part of the Corporation, that the Corporation should give a Series of 18 Concerts. . . . In this experiment, also, they have met with the ready co-operation of Her Majesty's Commissioners, who have lent their aid in the establishment of a Choral Society in connection with the Hall. This Society now numbers 1000 selected and well-trained voices, and the Committee consider that it is likely to be of great and permanent value to the Hall."

3. The People's Concerts were continued every Monday evening for forty weeks. Eventually, finding that they were financially not successful—there was a deficit on the series of about £750—the Council, with regret, felt compelled to discontinue them. A series of Six Military Concerts, at low, but still somewhat higher, prices than those fixed by the Provisional Committee for the People's Concerts, were tried in September and October, 1872. These, however, did not prove at all successful, financially.

4. The Council are glad to find that the Amateur Orchestral Society, under the Presidency of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, obtained sufficient support to encourage the hope that very shortly it may become a firmly established and self-supporting institution. The Society met for the first time in November last; upwards of 160 Members were present. There are now 198 enrolled Members of the Orchestra, and about 140 Honorary or Subscribing Members. The Society gave four Concerts, all of which were well attended by members and their friends. The last Concert was given in aid of the funds of the Ventnor Hospital for Consumption, and a sum of £150 was cleared, and paid over to the Committee of that Institution. It has been found advisable to limit the number of Honorary Members; and rules regarding the election of Honorary Members, their privileges, &c., are under consideration, and will be issued shortly to those Seat-holders of the R.A.H. who may feel interested in the Amateur Orchestral Society, and desire either to seek election or to recommend their friends for election.

5. Negotiations with the Royal Academy of Music, which were commenced with the view of making that old-established Institution the nucleus of a National Training School for Music, but which eventually came to nothing, somewhat delayed the proceedings with respect to the third point mentioned in the Report of the Provisional Committee. Your Council regret that the offer of Rooms, &c., made to the Royal Academy of Music should not have proved acceptable to that body. They are, however, glad to be able to state that active steps are now being taken by the Committee appointed by the Society of Arts to establish a National Training School for Music. Your Council have offered the use of the two Lecture Theatres and certain other Rooms in the Hall to the proposed School at a nominal rental. Arrangements are now in contemplation for building the School on a plot of ground immediately adjoining the Hall, and your Council trust that before the next Annual Meeting of the Corporation active measures will have been taken to carry out this most desirable national undertaking.

6. As respects the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, and the Eighteen Subscription Concerts announced in the Report of the Provisional Committee, your Council believe that they afforded the Seat-holders of the Hall very great enjoyment, consisting as they did of—

Six Operatic Concerts, given by Mr. Mapleson;
Four Choral Concerts, by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the direction of M. Gounod; Four Popular Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Chappell; and Four Oratorio Concerts, by the Sacred Harmonic Society.

The whole Series, as well as the establishment of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, was undertaken under a Guarantee Fund, provided by H.M. Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, to whom in this, and many other matters, the Royal Albert Hall Corporation are much indebted for their liberal aid in forwarding the interests of the Hall.

7. The Operatic Concerts of the before-mentioned Series were financially very successful, but the others were not, and the formation and management of the Choral Society involved very heavy expenses, insomuch that at the end of the season it was found that, after paying the absolute expenses of the Concerts in the Hall, there was a deficit of £3,140 to be paid by H.M. Commissioners on their guarantee.

8. In order to carry on the Choral Society, the Commissioners again offered to guarantee the Office and other Expenses of the Society to the extent of £600. With this guarantee the Council of the Albert Hall entered into arrangements with Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. for a Series of Six Oratorio Concerts, to be conducted by Mr. Joseph Barnby.

9. According to this arrangement, Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. undertook the management of the Concerts, paying all the expenses; these expenses being the first charge on the receipts, the ordinary charges to an entrepreneur taking the Hall being the second charge on the receipts, and any profits that might accrue over and above these being paid to Messrs. Novello.

10. The Council believe that the Seat-holders will agree with them in thinking that the Six Oratorio Concerts were admirably performed and that the Choral Society has been brought to a great state of perfection, under Mr. Barnby's direction. After covering all expenses, including those of the Hall, the receipts from these Concerts left £108 19s. 4d. to meet the Office expenses of the Choral Society, so that the Commissioners' Guarantee Fund will only be called upon to the extent of £420 19s. 2d. Under somewhat similar arrangements with Messrs. Novello, the following Concerts have also been given, with the aid of the Choral Society, viz.:—

Four Performances of Bach's Passion Music (St. Matthew), and One of the Messiah (during Passion Week).
One Concert of Mendelssohn's Music, on the 17th May.
One Ballad and Part Song Concert, on the 24th May, and One Operatic Concert on Whit Monday, 2nd June.

11. The experiment of having the Passion Music of Sebastian Bach for four evenings in succession—an experiment which the Council believe had never been tried before with music of this nature—was eminently successful. The audiences increased nightly, and by their manner of joining in the Chorales showed their interest in the subject. The Council consider it only right to record their thanks to Mr. Alfred Littleton, who has acted as Manager on behalf of Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co., for the spirited manner in which he has undertaken this business. Without the co-operation of this eminent firm the Council could not have been in a position to give the Seat-holders these advantages.

12. To recapitulate: Since the present Council came into office there have been—

40 People's Concerts.
29 Oratorio Concerts.
11 Operatic Concerts.
3 Combined Operatic and Military Concerts.
12 Instrumental Concerts.
28 Miscellaneous Concerts, and
3 Concerts of the London Musical Festival.

Making a total of 126 Concerts, exclusive of the daily Organ Performances and Instrumental Concerts now being given in the Hall, under the direction of Mr. Barnby. These 126 Concerts represent a money value of £36 14s. for each £100 seat.

In addition to these, an entertainment in honour of the Shah was given in the Hall, in which the Choral Society, under their Conductor, Mr. Barnby, took a leading part; and the Sunday Organ Performances, which were found so attractive, have been continued. The Council believe that the Seat-holders have every reason to be satisfied with the use that has been made of the Hall during the past year, and with the class of entertainments which have been afforded them.

13. Turning now to the financial state of the Corporation. At the time your Council came into office there was a debt of £10,943 on the Capital, and £1,419 on the Revenue Account, making a total of £12,362, the whole of which it was decided to treat as debt on the Capital Account. Though it had been originally proposed to raise a Capital of £250,000 by the sale of seats, only £206,885 had been so raised when your Council came into office, and it was then determined not to raise more than £225,000. £5,610 has been received since then from the sale of seats and from sums due on seats previously sold, thus making the total Capital raised £212,495, which, with money which has accrued on the Deposit Account, leaves a deficiency of £5,726 on the Capital Account. Your Council, considering that the future interests of the Hall and of the existing Seat-holders might be much compromised by allowing any more seats to fall into private hands, have discontinued their sale—at all events for the present.

14. At the commencement of the present year the Council found the receipts from Concerts, &c., would not of themselves cover the working expenses of the Hall, and that there was a deficiency on the Revenue Account. They therefore entered into an arrangement with Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, by which, on consideration of the repairs and maintenance of the Hall being undertaken by the Commissioners, who have so large a stake in the Hall, they were to have the use of the Hall in the daytime for the purposes of the Exhibition. This arrangement came into operation from the 1st March. By means of it the Council trust that they may be fully able to cover the other working expenses of the Hall. This arrangement has also given the Seat-holders the further advantage of the daily Organ Performances and Orchestral Concerts of Classical Music, besides the Sunday Organ Performances.

15. A Balance Sheet of both Revenue and Capital Account is appended. The Council believe that when the proceeds of the Entertainment given to the Shah are properly brought to account, the Revenue Account will show no deficit. The balance against the Capital Account of £5,726, as stated above, is therefore the only real deficit at the present time.

By order of the Council,
J. F. D. Donnelly, Major R.E.,
Honorary Secretary.

July, 1873.

Audited and found correct, H. C. E. CHILDERS, J. CLUTTON, A. G. FINLAISON.

FLORENCE.—The taste for old musical literature is spreading rapidly here. A great many works were sold during the month past. Among them were Li cinque Libri della Chitarra alla Spagnuola, a superb volume with autograph dedicatory letter, and richly bound, 1640; the sixth book of Five-Part Madrigals, by Luca Marenzio (very rare), 1603; the Lettioni per noteggiare a Voce sola con il suo Basso continuo, by Montvoli, Luca. 1702, etc. They all fetched high prices.

NAPLES.—It is reported that the management of the Teatro San Carlo has been assumed for two years by the Cavaliere Bonaventura d'Afflitto (a cousin of the late Prefect) with an annual grant of 250,000 francs from the Municipality.—A parody on Verdi's Aida has been produced at the little theatre called La Fenice.—The new Theatre in course of erection by Signor A. Prestreau in the fashionable Chiaja quarter is to be called the Teatro Sannazzaro, and will be opened in November next.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

Repetitions have been the order of the day since we last spoke about the proceedings at Mr. Mapleson's theatre, just as was stated last week in referring to those at Mr. Gye's. We have had repetitions of the Favorita, the Traviata, Semiramide, the Trovatore, Marta, Lucia di Lammermoor, Faust, Lucrezia Borgia, the Huguenots, Norma, Rigoletto, and Mignon. The greater number of these have been noticed. About the Trovatore there is merely a change or two to record. When the engagement of Signor Mongini had expired, and that stentorian tenor had gone over to Covent Garden, to replace Signor Urio in Guillaume Tell, and to play Otello to the Desdemona of Madame Adelina Patti, the Part of Manrico fell to the new tenor, Signor Aramburo, who, on account of the spirit with which he acquitted himself, may fairly be regarded as an acquisition of value to Mr. Mapleson's company, unusually rich in tenors, if not altogether of the first class (where are they now?) at least, as times go, very nearly approaching to it. Signor Campanini, one of the new-comers, and one of the instantaneously proclaimed "stars" of last season, has also appeared as Manrico. This gentleman excels rather in the cantabile than in the bravura style; and when it is stated that Signor Campanini shone to most advantage in "Ah si ben mio" and Signor Aramburo in its fiery sequel, "Di quello pira," a tolerably good notion is suggested of the capacity of both as expositors of Verdi's music, which so frequently balances between those extremes. In recent performances of Faust M. Capoul, the cherished favourite of the Opéra Comique, who first appeared among us at Her Majesty's Opera two years since, has represented the character of the hero, singing with his accustomed fervour, and acting, to employ the conventional French phrase, with his accustomed abandon. If this gentleman would restrain himself a little, and be occasionally less exaggerated, he would prove twice as acceptable; for that he is a serious and well-studied artist is beyond dispute. Mr. Mapleson's chief barytones—Signors Del Puente and Castelmary (new comers, of whom we have spoken), Rota and Mendioroz, &c.—render him excellent service by the accommodating manner in which they interchange characters, in order to impart some variety to the "cast" of operas which for years have been heard under all kinds of circumstances. They are, without exception, more or less artists of ability, and the director may congratulate himself on the possession of so many. His basses, too—Signor Agnesi, Signor Medini (a new-comer), Signor Borella, basso buffo, &c.—have been equally serviceable to him in a similar manner. Mdlle. Tietjens, upon whose broad shoulders the fortunes of the theatre for so many years have in a great measure rested, has added but one new part to her repertory—that of Leonora in the Favorita, her successful assumption of which was described at the time. No wonder that it should have been on more than one occasion repeated. To speak of Norma, produced a short time since, with Mdlle. Tietjens as the Druid Priestess, would be superfluous. That this accomplished lady is not simply the only Norma on the stage, but the greatest Norma since Grisi and Cruvelli, is notorious. In such characters Mdlle. Tietjens is without a rival. We may add here that, in the part of Adalgisa, the clever young artist, Mdlle. Bauermeister, was allowed such a chance of distinction as does not too often fall to her lot, and that she by no means lost it; on the contrary, her Adalgisa has decidedly raised her a step in public opinion. Signor Aramburo, too, is one of the very best representatives of Pollio we have seen of late. He sings the recitatives, airs and duets extremely well, and acts with appropriate vigour. That the music of Oroveso, High Priest, would suit the rich bass voice of Signor Medini might have been taken for granted. In a recent performance of Rigoletto another stranger, Signor Catalani, put down for the Court Jester, showed himself in no degree superior to his immediate predecessor, Signor del Puente, and was very far from being a Ronconi. On this occasion Signor Campanini played the Duke of Mantua (vice Signor Mongini), and created much the same impression as he created last year.

Although Mdme. Christine Nilsson has been here now two months, she has only appeared in four operas—Faust, La Traviata, Lucia, and Mignon. About the first three it is unnecessary to add one word to what has already been written. Frequent repetition only goes to prove that the Margaret, Violetta, and Lucia of the much admired Swedish songstress are among the most highly-finished performances on the London operatic boards. Her Mignon, which provoked such genuine enthusiasm when, three years since, an Italian version of the opera (the best, we think, of M. Ambroise Thomas) was brought out at Her Majesty's Opera, under the spirited direction of Mr. George Wood, retains all its strange and weird charm. The entire impersonation is a masterpiece, as subtily and beautifully imagined as it is perfectly carried out. A more gentle, poetical, and graceful conception is rare indeed. There is nothing affected or obtrusive in it. We have always before us, not only the familiar picture of Ary Scheffer, to which, in her characteristic costume, Mdlle. Nilsson bears a striking resemblance, but she conjures up visibly the true Mignon of Gœthe's famous romance—which redounds still more highly to the credit of the actress. As Mignon, the abject slave of the showman, Giarno; as Mignon, who conceals in her bosom a love for Guglielmo (Wilhelm Meister) no less deep and unfathomable than the hatred she entertains for Felina, her rival in the affections of her deliverer; and as Mignon, raised to an ecstasy of joy by the acknowledgment from Guglielmo of a love of which she had abandoned all hope, Mdlle. Nilsson is equally admirable. To describe minutely all the delicate points in her assumption would take more space than can be afforded. The last scene, although involving a liberty taken (among others) by MM. Barbiere and Carré, the French librettists—who have turned Gœthe to their purpose just as they afterwards turned Shakspere, in Romeo and Juliet and Hamlet—is the worthy climax. Mignon ought to die; but she does not die in the opera, and everybody is glad of it. About Mdlle. Nilsson's execution of the music, to say more than that it is almost faultless from beginning to end would be superfluous; but it would be hard not to devote a word to her exquisitely plaintive reading of "Non conosci quel solo?" ("Kennst du das Land?"), to her playful delivery of the romance, "Conosco un zingarello," and also of her part in the duet with Guglielmo, "Leggiadre rondinelle" ("Les Hirondelles"), accompanying herself on the harp. This last, as a matter of course, is uniformly encored. As Mdlle. Nilsson sings Ophelia so she sings Mignon, and, having a great deal more to sing in Mignon—if not in one particular scene like the scene of the madness and death of Ophelia—the public is all the more gratified. The Filina of Mdlle. Carlotta Grossi is in all respects excellent. In her histrionic delineation of the fascinating coquette she evinces real ability, and she executes the ornate and florid music with animation, fluency, and point. The Guglielmo of M. Capoul is thoroughly French, full of sentiment, occasionally overdone. His singing is to match; he gives not only the expression demanded, but something added to it in the bargain. Nevertheless, Signor Capoul is always in earnest, and, as he means well, his earnestness is not without its artistic significance. Madame Trebelli-Bettini does whatever can possibly be done with the small part of Federico, obtaining an "encore" in the rondo-gavotta of Act II.; and Signor Castelmary is a more than average good Lothario (the old harper—Mignon's father), the first representative of which character in England, it may be remembered, was M. Faure. The parts of Laerte and Giorno are assigned to Signor Rinaldini and Pro. The opera is got up with commendable care as to scenic arrangements, costumes, &c., while the chorus and orchestra, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, are everything that can be wished. Altogether Mignon is a genuine success.

The operas performed during the week have been Faust—with Mdlle. Marie Roze as Margaret (Monday); Mignon (Tuesday); La Favorita (Thursday); and Le Nozze di Figaro (to-night). Mdlle. Nilsson's "benefit and last appearance this season" is announced for Tuesday.

* * * * * * *

(Latest Intelligence.)

The performance of Faust on Monday evening served for the rentrée of Mdlle. Marie Roze in a character she had previously essayed on the same stage. That Mdlle. Roze is an artist of intelligence and ability need not be asserted, and if she again failed to make a very lively impression as the heroine of Gounod's opera, it was, perhaps, because the public are inclined to hypercriticism with reference to a part made familiar by the greatest prime donne. We should like to see Mdlle. Roze in a situation less open to severe comparisons, and in a character better adapted to her general style. Faust was again represented by Signor Campanini, whose faults seem to grow upon him with the advance of time. He should especially be cautioned against an increasing habit of spinning out his phrases to an undue length, and thus injuring the symmetry of the music he has to sing. The general representation of Faust calls for no particular remark, save that the orchestral work was perfectly done.

Mignon was played on Tuesday evening for the last time this season, and amateurs will now have to wait long for another enjoyment of Madame Nilsson's most charming and graceful representation of the leading character. Their Imperial Highnesses the Czarewitch and Czarevna, with their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, attended the performance, which was understood to be given by "special desire." The distinguished visitors, if desirous of honouring Mr. Mapleson's attractive prima donna could have made no better choice, because, taken for all in all, Mignon is the part wherein Madame Nilsson's genius shines its brightest. Her efforts on Tuesday night were entirely successful, and left an impression vivid enough to endure till the time when, as is hoped, she will repeat them on the same boards. The other parts in the opera were sustained as heretofore, the only change being in the shape of improvement. Mdlle. Grossi, for example, played Filina with additional spirit, and sang better than ever; while the Guglielmo of M. Capoul—always an earnest performance—left less than ever to desire. Of Madame Trebelli and Signor Castelmary there is nothing new to say.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

July 9, 1873.

The second and "Irrevocablement dernière representation" given by M. Brasseur on Wednesday last was, of course, a success. La Mariée de Mardi Gras went splendidly; M. Brasseur, in the character of Groseillon (the country cousin), eliciting roars of laughter, and the other members of the company justly earning hearty applause. The comic song by M. Brasseur, "Le Vieux" (Buveur)—the transformation scene from each verse to the refrain consisting in a change of action of the facial muscles and a temporary chimney pot on the cranium—also amused.

The local press seems so backward in coming forward and expressing any opinion on M. Clement Martin's new company at the opera here that I think we must give them one from your side of the Manche. The opening performance was that of Faust. M. Bresson was the hero; M. Larrivé the Mephistopheles; M. Ytrac, Valentino; M. Kinnel, Wagner; Mdlle. Telmâr, Marguerite; Mdlle. Anthié, Siebel; and Mdme. Champenois, Martha.

Thursday—the pretty little opera comique some 50 years old—Le Maitre de Chapelle, by Paër, followed by La Fille du Regiment. Saturday—Il Pleut, comedy in one act, and Les Mousquetaire de la Reine, Halévy. Sunday—La Dame Blanche, Boieldieu. Tuesday—Le Chalet, Adam, and Le Barbier où la precaution inutile.

So much for the names of the operas, now for the names of the singers. M. Bresson sings in about the same way he did last season, his voice has not changed in any way—decidedly not for the better. In the "tableau de la troupe," printed at the back of the bills, the first name (?) i.e., "Fort tenor de grand opéra," is indicated by three stars; when he arrives I hope he will be a star! M. Larrivé sang well as Mephistopheles, better as Salpinx (Sergeant, in La Fille du Regiment), and best as Basilio, in Il Barbiere. He has a good bass voice of moderate compass, sings with accuracy, and acts with spirit. M. Ytrac has met with applause, and deservedly so, in all the parts he has taken, for his careful singing and acting. M. Kinnel we knew last year and appreciated; but from his rendering of Bartolo, last night, in the Barbiere, I should say his voice has improved. Mdlle. Telmâr is a young—very young—lady of most prepossessing appearance; has been carefully trained in her profession, and has not long left the Conservatoire de Paris. Her method is good, her voice also, especially in the upper notes. She "looked" the timid Marguerite to perfection, but was naturally very timid, as was manifest in her acting and rendering of the last three acts, during which some notes were certainly not up to concert pitch. In La Fille du Regiment, especially in the second act, she certainly sang better, and better still in the Barbiere. We may yet hope that this piquant young artist will get more "at home" among us, and show the Boulognaises that, though her voice may not be a very powerful one, her careful training at such an institution as the Conservatoire de Paris has resulted successfully.

Mdlle. Anthié is an actress, and has a fine voice, which she knows how to use. The part of Gertrude, in Le Maitre de Chapelle, she sang and played to perfection; also in Le Chalet; and last, not least, she sang Siebel's part in Faust with perfect taste.

I need say little about Mdme. Champenois, the wife of our able conductor (chef d'orchestre). She is well-known to all (?) frequenters of Boulogne as a charming "mère dugazon;" and her interpretation of the part of La Marquise de Berkenfield in La Fille du Regiment only reminded us of the many times we have had the pleasure of seeing and hearing her before Thursday last.

Nothing new at the indoor concerts at the Etablissement, except, perhaps, I may mention especially a "Gavotte" by Ducoudray, and Ettling's Waltz on La Fille de Madame Angot, which is new and very charming. At the out-door concert nothing wonderful either in the selection of pieces or performance. I think "l'oiseau dit est ce que je suis l'Harmonie?"

Prospective arrangements: Monday next, Lesueur of the Variétés and some other artists, on a tour through France; in August "representations donné par Ismaël, et Mmes. Galli, Marie, et Priola, de l'Opera Comique;" of which more anon!—S. C.

ORGANS.

(From the "Globe.")

A suggestion is being made that, at a time when technical knowledge upon all branches of art and industry is being widely diffused, something should be done to introduce to the public the rather unfamiliar subject of the construction, mechanism, and perfection of an organ. Exhibitions and lectures have given persons who seek for such information every opportunity of following the history of the piano from the clavecin down to the concert-grand of our own days. The pedigree of the modern instrument, like that of a great and powerful family, has been traced out fully and accurately, and the subject has always been interesting. The possession of old violins becomes a passion with the collector who abandons himself to the task, and has unlimited funds to devote to his gratification. But who, except the organ-builder and the organ-player, can tell us anything about organs? For the general public they are a mere collection of tubes and pipes arranged in rows, and associated generally with hymn-tunes. Persons who have been in organ-lofts carry away a confused idea of the player working at a kind of tread-mill with his feet, and pulling out signals from time to time with little ivory labels upon them. This and the laborious exertions of the organ-blower, whose unproductive function seems to be that of always collecting volumes of air for the player to disperse, form probably the idea that it is most generally suggested by the word organ. When a magnificent instrument is destroyed, it seems never to occur to the public mind that mere outlay of money may never avail to replace it; that, as an instrument, it has quite as great an individuality as a picture or a statue. In foreign countries a great organ-builder takes the rank which we here accord to artists or architects, and any one who has visited Friburg and heard its organ may well judge what cause the citizens have to be proud of Van Mooser. At the church of St. Mary, at Berlin, was lately celebrated the 150th commemoration of the setting up of its organ by the famous builder, John Joachim Wagner, and a similar celebration is announced to take place in 1875 in honour of the instrument, by the same great artist, now in the garrison church at Berlin. If the organs of the London churches were all burned down to-morrow, there would probably be a subscription amongst the different congregations to replace them; but few would have any associations with the old instruments, or feel any doubt that sufficient funds could at once reproduce them.

BERLIN.—The Emperor of Germany has commanded that the cross-street leading from the thoroughfare known as "In den Zelten" to the Kronprimzufer shall be called the Beethovenstrasse. This will be the first street here ever called after a musician.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Les Diamans de la Couronne was repeated on Saturday night, and again brought together an immense audience. As we had anticipated would be the case, many curtailments have been made by Signor Vianesi in the accompanied recitatives, and some of the interpolated pieces were omitted—an improvement not to be questioned. Still further condensation is, however, indispensable in order that Auber's charming work, which sparkles like champagne from the first bar to the last, may become, what with such precautions it is sure to become, another permanently attractive addition to Mr. Gye's unequalled repertory. That the clever conductor and excellent musician upon whom the task devolved of filling up what required no filling up at all, except in the shape of some delicately accompanied "recitativo parlante," will diligently set to work in the matter we believe. Signor Vianesi's recitatives are excellent in their kind, and might play a conspicuous part in some opera of his own composition; but they have nothing in common with music like that of the Diamans de la Couronne. Objection may equally be urged against the pieces introduced from Auber's early operas, La Niège and Leicester, which only serve to exhibit the singers at the expense of the composer. The air for Mdme. Monbelli, and the duet for the same lady and Signor Cotogni, introduced at the beginning of the second act, are without meaning, and require the omission of one of the prettiest passages in the opera. True, they are from La Niège, but Auber never intended them for an opera composed so many years later. Then, why should the first finale be curtailed, and that beautiful and characteristic sarabande omitted, to make room for an uncalled-for duet between Caterina and Enrico—as if Mdme. Patti had not had already enough to do, reckoning the bolero-duet with Diana (encored) and the grand air with variations, sung as no one else before her has ever sung them? The songs interpolated in the third act, for Signors Cotogni and Ciampi, were out of place, and we pity Signor Vianesi, who, no doubt, was compelled to write them in order to satisfy the vanity of these gentlemen, and by this means induce them to take part in the performance. Worst of all, we find the omission of the soliloquy for the Queen (Act III.), and the substitution by Mdme. Patti of an air from Leicester, another early opera of Auber's which comes exactly in the wrong place—at the end of the opera, thus robbing the climax of its significance.

But to have done with criticism, the Diamans de la Couronne is a complete success—a success which the wonderful singing and acting of Mdme. Patti would alone have insured; and little more is required to make it one of the chief attractions of next season. On Saturday night Mdme. Patti created the utmost enthusiasm—and no wonder. We shall return to Les Diamans.

The operas performed during the week have been Il Trovatore, with Mdme. Patti (Monday); Le Nozze di Figaro, first time (Tuesday); Faust e Margherita (Thursday); and Les Diamans de la Couronne (Friday). Le Nozze di Figaro is announced for to-night.

(Latest intelligence.)

A revival of Le Nozze di Figaro, on Tuesday night, was welcome to the lovers of classical opera, who have not received more than fair consideration this season. Acceptable under any circumstances, for the sake of Mozart's delicious music, Le Nozze was made specially interesting by a cast which included several artists new to their respective characters on the English stage. Mdlle. Albani appeared as the Countess, and added a part to her repertory wherein she will probably make a good effect at no distant date. The Canadian lady sang all the music with intelligence and care, and with a success greater than that usually attendant upon her efforts in a lighter style. She phrased well, and manifested that reverence for the composer which is a true sign of a true artist. But Mdlle. Albani does not yet perfectly comprehend the character, and hence the mistake of trying to give it a dramatic significance it will not bear. That is unquestionably a true stage tradition which invests the Countess with an air of tender melancholy and perfect restraint. On this point there can be no higher authority than Beaumarchais himself, who, in a preface to the original edition of his comedy, says:—

"La Comtesse, agitée de deux sentimens contraires, ne doit montrer qu'une sensibilité réprimée, ou une colère très-modérée; rien surtout qui dégrade aux yeux du spectateur son caractère amiable et vertueux."

Mdlle. Albani missed the point of this direction, and erred on the side of a tendency to be too demonstrative. But the fault is one that only needs to be recognized in order to be removed. Madame Monbelli, as Susannah, acted with a refinement and propriety for which we were not altogether prepared. While sufficiently adroit, she never lapsed into boldness or effrontery; and, it is needless to say, she sang the delightful music of the confidante with perfect taste, though her voice is not sufficiently powerful to make the best effect in so large a space. As Cherubino, Mdlle. Smeroschi overdid her work, after a fashion to which this lady is no stranger. Nothing is easier than to overact Cherubino, and nothing is more fatal to legitimate success. Here let us quote Beaumarchais once more:—

"Timide à l'excès devant la Comtesse ailleurs un charmant polisson: un desir inquiet et vague est le fond de son caractère. Il s'élance a la puberté, mais sans projet, sans connoissances."

How easily Cherubino may be made a very different character to this is often illustrated on the operatic stage; and, without intending it, Mdlle. Smeroschi conveyed an idea that the page was not altogether sans projet. The artist sang cleverly, as usual, and was called upon to repeat "Voi che sapête." M. Maurel added to his fast-increasing reputation by a careful and artistic embodiment of the Count; M. Faure was once again a capital Figaro; and Mdlle. Ancse, Signor Bettini, Signor Ciampi, and Signor Tagliafico duly re-appeared in the characters with which they have long been associated. Signor Bevignani conducted in an able manner; and the overture was warmly encored. T.E.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The concerts of this old and distinguished society ended for the present year on Monday, when a selection of average interest was performed. Few of the Society's programmes are now destitute of novelty, but the novelty of the closing "scheme" had an historical as well as musical interest. This will be readily understood when we say that the work in question was a symphony in D, by C. P. E. Bach, the second and most widely-known son of the great Sebastian. Emmanuel Bach, after improving upon the orchestral suites of his father as regards form, handed down the task of development to Haydn, in whose hands the orchestral symphony took its now perfct shape. Haydn, as is well known, cherished a great admiration for the music of Emmanuel Bach; and, most probably, the work played for the first time in England on Monday is an immediate progenitor of the modern symphony. Thus regarded, its importance becomes obvious, whatever the intrinsic merit of the music—merit which, we are bound to add, is not very great. The linking of all three movements together in a feature worthy of note, because carrying far back the origin of a device with which Beethoven was long credited. Mozart and Haydn both employed the device, and in E. Bach's symphony we have a still earlier example. Who knows if the earliest has yet been discovered? M. Colyns' playing of an uninteresting movement from Rode's eighth violin concerto was excellent, and called forth regret that abilities so great should be devoted to music so small. English amateurs must know more of this able Belgian artist. Respecting Madame Carreno-Sauret's performance of Mendelssohn's Rondo brillante in B minor, for piano and orchestra, we will only say that it by no means showed the lady at her best. A second hearing of Mr. G. A. Macfarren's overture to John the Baptist strengthened the favourable impression made by its production in January last. More picturesque, suggestive, and ably written music seldom comes to us from contemporary talent. Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Weber's Jubilee overture (which always winds up the Philharmonic year) were other conspicuous features in the programme. The vocalist was Mdlle. Tietjens, who sang two of her best known operatic selections, and also Schubert's "Gretchen." Mr. Cusins must be congratulated upon having brought to a successful end one of the most attractive seasons in the history of the society. T. E.

VENICE.—According to the Arte drammatica, it has been resolved to pull down the Teatro Rossini, formerly the Teatro San Benedetto, and to erect upon the site a new theatre dedicated exclusively to the non-lyric drama.

MUSICAL REMINISCENCES OF TRAVEL.*

By W. Langhans.

In the performance of new operas, Italy is richer than any other country. The traveller athirst for music must, of course, sometimes be prepared to undergo incredible extremes of wearisomeness, and to have his patience subjected to the severest trials. Such was my lot in Genoa with La Notte degli Schiaffi (The night of Slaps), the music by Venzano. Everyone knows Venzano's charming waltz, which, for the last twenty years, has formed an item in the list of our fair vocal virtuosas, and even obtained for its author the honour of figuring in the programme of the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts. Now as I am not one of those who say: "In my opinion a good waltz is preferable to a bad symphony," but actually assert that: "A good waltz pleases me quite as much as a good symphony," † I never thought lightly of Signor Vanzano, and it was only natural that I should consider him capable of writing a good comic opera as well as anything else. On this occasion, however, my confidence was shamefully abused. The libretto, turning upon a scene of nocturnal mistakes with obbligato slaps on the ear in a garden (See Le Nozze di Figaro, Act II), is, if possible, surpassed by the insipidity of the music, and I do not know whose patience I ought to have admired most: that of the artists, of the audience, or of myself, for I sat out half the opera. Of the impressions of the evening I remember only one: the locality—a concert-room of the smallest dimensions. On the improvised stage, the dramatis personæ appeared immensely big, so that, for instance, in the scene where their ears are boxed, the spectator felt far more inclined to the belief that he was witnessing a combat of giants or Titans than a comic opera.

Milan—"Milano la grande," the "Piccolo Parigi," as Italians are fond of calling it, for "it forms its people," exactly like our own little Paris in Germany—Milan once more impressed me as being the musical capital of Italy, though I heard there next to nothing. But, to compensate me, I was fortunate enough to form the acquaintance of Alberto Mazzucato, Director of the Conservatory, and, under his guidance, as intelligent as it was amiable, to obtain a nearer insight into the grandest and most celebrated school of music in Italy. I do not consider this the place for statistical data, for which I refer you to Cenni storici sul R. Conservatorio in Milano—a perfect specimen, by the way, of typography, and as such destined to represent Italy at the Vienna Exhibition—published by Ricordi; I may, however, state that the general impression produced on me by my wanderings through the establishment completely agreed with my expectations, and I have no hesitation in placing the Milan Conservatory immediately next the model institutions of Paris and Brussels. The visitor is especially reminded in many ways of the former, a fact, which is the more intelligible as the plan for both conservatories, as they now exist, sprang from the same brain, that of the first Napoleon, whose wish it was not simply to adorn his favourite city of Milan with triumphal arches and amphitheatres, but to bequeath her, in her school of music, an incomparably more precious monument of his care. But it was not alone in its organisation, as shown by the statutes, that I perceived points of resemblance between the two; such points were found also in the method of instruction; it is only here during an orchestral lesson, at which the pupils happened to be practising the Adagio of Beethoven's Second Symphony, that I ever met with the attention bestowed on the phrasing and the pleasing instrumental harmony, which have caused the performances of the Paris Conservatory to be so justly and so generally famous.

I could not possibly bid farewell to Milan and Italy without paying the Lucca publishing firm a visit; a visit of congratulation for the comparatively brilliant success of its efforts to introduce German music into Italy, and a visit of condolence in remembrance of the ill-fortune attending the first appearance (during the last Carnival) of Lohengrin in Milan. I am sorry to be under the necessity of uttering a harsh word against Milan, but, judging from the detailed account given me at Lucca's of the contest, which was conducted with unexampled bitterness, Milan, unhappily, deserves, also, in a bad sense, its name of "Little Paris," as the motives of the contest, as well as the means employed, were precisely the same as those in the notorious Tannhäuser affair (1861), which did the great city of Paris so little honour. It is to be hoped that the Milanese will reflect that none of their brethren at Bologna died from listening to one of Wagner's operas, and that they will not wait too long before they cause the sad reminiscence to be forgotten. Madame Lucca, at any rate, who, since her husband's decease, has carried on the establishment with wonderful business knowledge and energy, and thereby become the life and soul, as it were, of the Wagner movement in Italy, has by no means abandoned the idea of seeing Wagner's music honoured, ere long, even in the Scala. She began by revenging herself in the most clever manner for the trick played on her favourite: the members of the chorus and orchestra employed in Lohengrin received from her 2,000 francs in gold, as smart-money, while the like sum was presented by her to the Director of the Conservatory, for a specially gifted pupil, who cherished a wish to render himself intimately acquainted with the nature of German music, and the execution of it in Germany. Meanwhile, Madame Lucca extends her propaganda with the aid of the Quartet Society, a body which cultivates, with a view to progress, not the stringed quartet alone, but orchestral music of all kinds, having, last winter, as we know, executed Raff's symphony: "Im Walde," and, being engaged in practising, during my stay, the prelude to Wagner's Meistersinger.

The two works mentioned, as well as Wagner's Fliegender Holländer, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and a host of others belonging to the new German school, which would scarcely have otherwise found their way into Italy, have been published by the house of Lucca, and travel to Vienna, where, by the correctness and neatness of the engraving, as well as by the serious elegance with which they are got up, they cannot fail to excite the attention of competent judges.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† It is only that we may not in any way disturb our respected collaborator's elegant flow of style, that we have left untouched this passage, calculated as it is to meet with opposition on the part of instrumental musicians. We here, once in a way, exercise our right of grace. We confidently hope, however, that the respected author will in future not be guilty of any similar crimen læsæ majestatis against us.—Ed. N. B. M.

THE CASE OF CAROLINE VAN BEETHOVEN.

We have now obtained, on the very best authority, the sorrowful certainty that Madame Caroline van Beethoven, the widow of that nephew whom Beethoven loved above everything, is living in the most wretched poverty.

Every right minded man is at liberty to think as he chooses of relieving cases of distress. But the real admirer of a Genius should endeavour to identify himself with the latter's soul. Let him ask himself: what would Beethoven had done under the present circumstances. Would not Beethoven, who was able to starve himself, only that his nephew Carl might be comfortable, have given up everything to preserve from want and misery the offspring of this very Carl whom he so idolised?

Let the Musicians of the present age be once more reminded how well and nobly Beethoven in his day behaved, when a daughter of Bach was in the same wretched circumstances as his own niece is now. Let everyone apply to Beethoven's niece what Beethoven said of Bach's daughter: "Damit es geschehe, ehe uns d i e s e Bach stirbt, ehe dieser Bach austrocknet und wir ihn nicht mehr tränken kann." *

Again has musically-educated Germany a duty of honour to perform. How will it acquit itself? If its love for Beethoven is not merely an empty phrase, we may hope for the most gratifying results.

We most earnestly beg all musical circles not only to spread this appeal to the best of their ability, but themselves directly to urge the collection of subscriptions, to aid the widowed Madame Beethoven in her distress.

We shall gratefully receive every donation, however trifling.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 12, 1873.

WE have received an early copy of the Hereford Festival programme, and cannot do better with it than, at once, publish such details as may interest those of our readers who take any interest at all in the oldest of musical gatherings.

We should premise that the Festival which begins in the ancient cathedral of the "cider county," on September 9, is the hundred and fiftieth meeting of the "Three Choirs." Even in conservative England a century and a half makes a good old age—as the age of a musical institution; indeed, so many years are a phenomenon worthy to be noted. Having lasted so long, we may reasonably hope that the Festival will endure. It is not easy for Boreas, however he may bluster, to topple over the oak which has sent its roots down into the soil for thrice fifty years; nor may the enemies of the West Country "Music Meetings" hope to work their will upon it without a sturdy resistance. But a truce to prospecting the future. Enough that at present the Festival is safe, and means to keep its hundred and fiftieth birthday in a worthy fashion.

Our first glance at the programme shows a noble array of those gentlemen—hight "Stewards"—who, in effect, guarantee the expenses of the Festival, so that, in case of disaster, the charity may not suffer. Among the eighty-six names in the list we do not see that of the Lord Bishop; but the absence of that dignitary is of small account when the presence of the Dean, four Prebendaries, and other members of the chapter, is secured. These gentlemen have the fate of the gathering in their hands, inasmuch as they could refuse the Cathedral. With them on the right side, therefore, it matters little what the Bishop chooses to do. And now for the executive forces over which Mr. Townshend Smith will once more preside. The principal engagements are those of Mdlle. Tietjens, Miss Wynne, Mdlle. Bartowska, Mdme. Bettini, Miss Enriquez, Messrs. Cummings, Montem Smith, Lloyd, Santley and Signor Agnesi, with M. Sainton as solo violinist and "leader" of the orchestra. Against these names there is nothing to be said, but we may pertinently ask where are some others—those for example, of Mdme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Lewis Thomas? Mdme. Patey is at the head of oratorio contraltos, and it cannot for a moment be pretended that either Mdme. Bettini or Miss Enriquez are so efficient in sacred music. Decidedly this lady should have been secured for Hereford, no matter who was passed over. M. Reeves' claims speak for themselves, and in Mr. Thomas we have a tried and experienced English artist, versed in the traditions of oratorio, and well able to carry them out. Preferring to him a foreigner like Signor Agnesi, who, though a clever artist, is no singer of oratorio, surely means a grave mistake, quite apart from any rights legitimately belonging to native talent. The Hereford orchestra will consist of the usual complement of London players, and the chorus has been drawn from the customary sources. On these points the Festival will show no falling off.

Coming to the programme, we find Elijah set down for the opening performance in the Cathedral. Mendelssohn's oratorio is indispensable on these occasions, and it may fitly be used to begin, as the Messiah may fitly be used to end the proceedings. The second (Wednesday) morning is devoted to Handel's Jephtha, in a much shortened form, and Rossini's Stabat Mater. Jephtha will be a novelty, and, as so many of its numbers are widely known, we may hope that it will be an attraction also. As for the Stabat Mater, Rossini's ornate strains—the aptest musical embodiment of Roman Catholicism—never fail of eager listeners. Thursday morning's scheme is quite miscellaneous. First comes Sir F. A. G. Ouseley's new oratorio, Hagar, a work written for the Festival. We are not able at present to say anything as to the character of the music (which was rehearsed in London on Thursday last), but an Oxford professor should, at all events, give us plenty of science. After Hagar come the fourth and fifth movements from Spohr's Consecration of Sound. Symphonic music in a cathedral is no novelty at Hereford, Mendelssohn's Reformation having been successfully played there three years ago. That Spohr's music will be equally a success we do not doubt, and Mr. Smith deserves commendation for so good a choice, as well as for his boldness in introducing purely orchestral music to a Cathedral audience. Spohr's Christian's Prayer follows the symphonic movements, and the rear is brought up by Handel's Chandos Anthem, No. 6, "O praise the Lord with one consent." Here, also, Mr. Smith has earned a word of approval. The Chandos Anthems contain many of Handel's freshest and noblest thoughts—reason sufficient to make us wonder at the persistent neglect from which they have suffered, and to justify the presence of one of them in the Hereford scheme. As usual, the Messiah, on Friday morning, brings the Cathedral performances to an end.

The first evening concert (Tuesday) will take place in the Shire Hall, and presents a long selection from Semiramide, the overture to Der Freischütz, and a group of miscellaneous pieces. On Wednesday evening Mendelssohn's St. Paul will be performed in the Cathedral—a happy innovation, tried three years ago with great success, when Mr. Barnby's Rebekah and a part of the Creation were given. St. Paul is very welcome anywhere; but in the grand old edifice on the Wye, and at night, it will have a unique effect. Thursday evening is devoted to miscellaneous secular pieces in the Shire Hall. The programme contains the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, as well as some classical selections for solo or concerted voices. And on Friday evening, as usual at Hereford only, a concert of chamber music will be given, including Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 77), Mendelssohn's Quartet in A minor (Op. 13), and Beethoven's Quartet in F (No. 1). With such artists as MM. Sainton, Ralph, R. Blagrove, and Pettit, this performance cannot fail to add much to the highest musical importance of the Festival.

On the whole, the programme is a good one, worthy of a venerable institution and of the art. Let us hope that success will wait upon the performance and crown the work.

—o—

OUR evening contemporary, the Globe, a short time since, contained an "occasional note" worth serious consideration. Everyone has heard about the Requiem Mass which the celebrated Verdi has composed in honour of his no less celebrated countryman, the late novelist, Manzoni. Verdi, like Rossini, prefers the rich and musical voices of women to the shrill screeching of boys; and while the voices of women are indispensable to the music of the Opera, he is unable to see (and we are just as blind as he is) why they should be dispensed with in the music of the Church. Surely what God has given us of the most divine should, out of sheer reverence and gratitude, be employed when necessary in His worship. But, without further preamble, we subjoin the really sensible "occasional" of our contemporary:—

"Modern composers have treated the music of the Mass from such an intensely dramatic point of view, that the soprano and contralto are as necessary to the fitting execution of a great musical 'function' as of an opera on the stage. For many years past, however, the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church have been studiously depriving it of one of the most important parts of its artistic machinery for fascinating impressible minds. The order issued by Dr. Manning last October, forbiding the employment of female singers in the churches of his diocese, was one episode in a long war between the authorities and the Church composers. Rossini, whose music was always essentially theatrical, naturally protested with all his energy against throwing that form of song which requires the deepest emotion and the highest culture into the hands of slovenly and half trained choir-boys. Now Signor Verdi has entered the field on the same side, and the battle is being waged over the grave of Manzoni. The ruling Church powers at Milan have refused to allow women to sing in the Funeral Mass which the chief Italian composer has written in memory of the greatest Italian novelist, and Signor Verdi has naturally refused to cut down his elaborate soprano and contralto music to the level and capacity of boy choristers. The end, not of this particular quarrel, but of the entire war, will probably be to drive good performances of old ecclesiastical music out of the churches to the concert-rooms. Music in Roman Catholic churches will be no less theatrical, but instead of being well done it will be badly done. What worship is to gain by this result is rather hard to discover; but it is easy to see how much influence the Roman Catholic Church must inevitably lose."

We heartily agree with every word and syllable of the above. A more absurd prejudice than that which prohibits women from taking audible part in solemn worship, where men are allowed to do so, can hardly be imagined, or one more logically inexplicable. Surely if men have souls so have women—"which," to cite a quaint sentence of Sir Thomas Browne, "is man also." Further than this, the sentiment of religion is, in the majority of instances, impressed more deeply on the heart of woman than on the heart of man. No woman, unless she may happen to be a blue-stocking philosophaster, is a sceptic. To the religion which she has been taught in childhood she firmly adheres through life; and thus a woman of firmness and spirit, provided she be not a mere bigoted devotee is enabled to exercise an early and beneficial influence on her children, and does, for the most part, exercise it. This cannot be adduced of man, who has that to transact in the business of the world to which woman can contribute little or nothing advantageously, and from which it is clear the more steadily she keeps away the better for her. Heaven forbid that the new-fangled idea now zealously upheld in certain quarters—the idea of making woman neither more nor less than man in softer clothing—should ever obtain general acceptance. The charm of woman is her unlikeness to man. But when (to leave speculation) we come to the question of music, "the divine art," as it is not inaptly called, our argument is trebly strong—"refutation-tight," as Shelley expresses it. The voice of woman, whether in speech or in song, is the loveliest sound of creation, not only when "ever soft and low," like that of King Lear's youngest daughter, but when, as in music, giving expression either to holy fervour or to passionate emotion. Do the great German masters, from J. S. Bach and Handel down to Spohr and Mendelssohn, abolish woman's voice from their sacred music?—No; no more than does Rossini, whose Stabat Mater we hold, with Heinrich Heine, is, from Rossini's point of view, as strictly and sincerely devotional as the Requiem of Mozart.

But it is scarcely worth while pursuing the subject further. To reject from God's worship that which God has fashioned of the most beautiful is, to our mind, ingratitude to the world's Creator and the donor of all the blessings vouchsafed to its inhabitants. And here is a case in point. While we write, the woman's voice dominating with liquid and penetrating tones the massive harmonies of the "Sanctus" in Mendelssohn's Elijah, and the rapturous ecstasy of "O that I had the wings of a dove," to which no other voice than a female soprano could give befitting expression, come forcibly before us. Let us hope that Dr. Manning may relent, and that the enthusiastic Verdi may triumphantly carry his point against all objectors, however obstinate and powerful. Abbate Liszt to the rescue! Z.

MILAN.—Signor Pedrotti's Olema la Schiava continued to be as loudly applauded at its successive representations as it was on the first night, but the audiences, despite the great attraction of Signora Galletti, kept on growing small by degrees and beautifully less, until the management put up Il Barbiere, with Signora Leon Duval, Signori Corsi, Aldighieri and Lombardelli.—The business at the Fossati has been exceedingly good. The last novelty was Signor Petrella's Precauzioni, with Signora Bozzetti in the principal female part, and Signor Grandillo as buffo.—Signori Polese and Ravizza have been accepted by the Municipality as lessees of the Canobbiana.

MADRID.—A new ballet entitled Fanny Elssler is shortly to be produced at the Teatro del Circo.

GENOA.—The Cavaliere Bossola is organising a series of Popular Concerts for classical instrumental music.

ANOTHER WORLD.

Preface to the Third Edition.*

The lines on the title-page, quoted from The Poet of Philosophy,† are suggestive of only a single link in the chain of phenomena through which the manners and customs of another planet have been revealed to our own.

The book has been received with a favour beyond what might have been anticipated, regard being had to the difficulty, in this sceptical age, of making the truth appear like the truth. The facts disclosed, however, have, with rare exception, been treated as creations of the fancy, and not as realities. In specific or gracefully veiled terms, the Editor has been accredited with inventive power, imagination, and mastery of fiction.

Though he cannot lay claim to such gifts, their application to him evidences the acumen of the writers; for in the actual state of the world's belief, unwilling to recognise the truth, they have ascribed to the author powers which alone could dress fiction in the garb of truth. In other words, a statue with life-like qualities has been supposed where the living man has been ignored.

The Editor must therefore await a time, perhaps not far distant, when credence will be given to his assertion that the "Fragments" have their source not in his imagination, but in another planet. Meanwhile his grateful thanks are offered to those who—in the words of the first Preface—have "tasted the fruit and judged of its flavour, though they beheld not the tree; profited by the diamonds, though they knew not how they were extracted from the mine; accepted what was found to be wholesome in the waters, though the source of the river was unknown."

In a literary sense, the Editor has been highly complimented by a suggested association of these "Fragments" with a work of one of the most celebrated and comprehensive writers of modern times—Lord Lytton. The Editor is entitled to no such compliment; for, independently of the absolute nature of the facts he discloses, he had not seen or even heard of the work of Lord Lytton until after Another World was printed and published.

Another World has been in manuscript for upwards of ten years; and long before the Coming Race appeared, the editor had submitted an analysis of the contents of his manuscript to one of the most illustrious rulers of Europe, now defunct. This was done more particularly with a view to the great good that might result from the training of "Character Divers" in the art of detecting and curing incipient faults of the young—education being a subject which then occupied the serious attention of that potentate.

The Editor had several conversations with the late Professor of Electric Science, Mr. Faraday, on the subject of the system of Electricity, set forth in these fragments, and submitted a portion of his manuscript to that great man. Mr. Faraday's opinion like the opinion of the Electricians in the Montalluyah of former times, was opposed to the proposition that there were any differences between the various kinds of electricity—in other words, that all electricities, wherever derived, are one and the same, producing, so far as is known, similar effects. Some correspondence passed on the subject, which, though not favourable to the actual Montalluyan view of electricity, the Editor highly prizes.

Whilst urging, rightly or wrongly time will show, that the facts described could exist only under electrical conditions different from those of the earth, the acknowledged High Priest of the science was sufficiently free from the worship of the "Idols of the Den." So much so, indeed, that, whether through kindly feeling, or through the interest he took in the subject, he admitted into the Temple, as it were, a strange worshipper, to whom he exhibited, in the Laboratory of the Royal Institution, some interesting phenomena. Among them was the transmutation of water and metals, the one into gases, the other into oxides, recalling both to their normal condition by the action of electricity. This he did the more clearly to explain what he thought was correct, and what he thought was erroneous, in the Editor's theory.

But, apart from some slight accord in one or two reflections arising from the fact that a superior mind like that of Lord Lytton, while creating an imaginary state of being under exceptionable and unknown conditions, would naturally have hit upon certain abstract truths (the prerogative of genius), the Editor believes that no likeness whatever will be found between the Coming Race or, indeed, between any account of a non-existing commonwealth, and Another World. Besides, the one simply describes a fictitious world with imaginary inhabitants; the other gives a faithful, though at present incomplete, account of an actually existing world, whose inhabitants are formed like those of our own planet.

The Editor might have relied on the utter dissimilarity of the two works; but he is anxious to remove every shadow of doubt. Nothing would be more fatal to the growth of a belief in the truth of the facts embodied in these "Fragments," and to the good they are calculated to effect, than a misapprehension that they had anything in common with the speculations of a writer of romance, however illustrious. Having said thus much, the Editor leaves impartial readers to decide which of the two works contains suggestions of the greater practical importance to mankind. Hermes.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It is not Italian Opera alone which nourishes the sacred flame of art amid the frosts of Russia. Moscow boasts of two national theatres, one dedicated to tragedy and ballet, and the other to comedy and vaudeville. Nor are Russian artists less admired and esteemed than foreign virtuosos. They receive large salaries, and can look forward calmly to the Future, because they know that at the conclusion of their active artistic career a pension from the Imperial treasury is in store for them. They are sought after by their fellow citizens, who no longer entertain against persons of their profession the prejudices which were generally prevalent until very recently, and which, even now, are not altogether exploded. When Maximow died, his body was followed by the students of the St. Petersburgh University, by the staff of professors, and by the most celebrated personages in the capital. The Emperor even sent his carriages to swell the procession in honour of his favourite comedian. At the benefit of Petrow, the bass-singer, the mercantile corporation of Kostinoy-Dwor, presented him with a gilt silver cup, a foot high, filled with gold.

A great deal has been said about the friendship which existed between Rossini and Carafa. It is asserted, however, that when Rossini, as a young man, was all the rage in Italy, Carafa could not resist exclaiming the day after the first representation of one of his friend's operas: "What a lucky fellow that Rossini is! He does not know much, and yet he is continually achieving great successes!" Rossini, on the other hand, the day after the first performance of an opera by his friend would say: "What a pity! Carafa is very talented, but all he does is a failure!"

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

A large audience assembled in St. James's Hall last Tuesday afternoon week, on the occasion of the concert given by Signor Arditi, whose popularity was shown by the warm reception he met with and the favour with which the entire proceedings were regarded. The first part consisted entirely of miscellaneous selections, vocal and instrumental, in the rendering of which Mdlle. Valleria, Madame Trebelli, Miss José Sherrington, MM. Naudin, Gardoni, Borella, Foli, De Soria, Caravoglia, and Rendano (pianoforte) were associated. Signor Foli gave a very effective rendering of Pinsuti's Raft, and M. de Soria achieved a great success in Faure's "Les Rameaux," singing it with a fine baritone voice and in such good style as to rouse the audience to a high state of admiration. In response to an encore the French artist gave a little song by Wekerlin. Signor Rendano played Mendelssohn's Scherzo from A Midsummer Night's Dream with ability, and Madame Trebelli was encored in Offenbach's "C'est l'Espagne." The second part contained nothing but the Ode recently performed at the Crystal Palace, for which it had been expressly written by Signor Arditi. It was conducted by the composer, as a matter of course; and a full orchestra and chorus, with Mdlle. Tietjens, Madame Patey, Mr. Rigby, and Signor Foli as principals, gave full effect to the music. Our opinion of the work having been expressed very recently, there is no need to criticise it here. Enough that it was heard to better advantage than at Sydenham, all the various features of the orchestration being thrown into strong relief, and making a proportionate impression. Most of the solos, choruses, &c., were loudly applauded, and, at the close of the work, Signor Arditi became the object of another demonstration of respect from his numerous and fashionable patrons.

THE fifth Floral Hall concert, and last of the season, took place on Saturday, when, as previously, the principal singers of the Royal Italian Opera were heard in a varied selection of music, mostly dramatic. Madame Patti sang "Una voce" and "Katheen Mavourneen" (encored and replaced by "Comin' thro' the rye"); other attractive performances were contributed by Mdlles. Albani, Scalchi, and D'Angeri, Madame Sinico, Signori Nicolini, Pavani, Bagagiolo, Graziani, M. Maurel, and other prominent members of the Opera company. The Hungarian Gipsy band appeared on the occasion, and were encored in a characteristic national waltz. Sir Julius Benedict, Signors Vianesi and Bevignani conducted in alternation.

THE fourth of the series of opera-concerts at Albert Hall took place here on Saturday, and the performances were again those of the principal singers and the orchestra of Her Majesty's Opera. Madame Nilsson was heard in several favourite pieces—the Romance from Mignon, "Non conosci" ("Kennst du das Land"); and (with Signor Castelmary) in the duet, "Leggiardro rondinelle," from the same opera —and in the scena, "Ah! fors è lui," from La Traviata. Various other attractive features rendered the concert equally as successful as on any of the preceding occasions; the programme being also enriched by contributions from Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Mdlles. Marie Roze, Valleria, Grossi, Signori Campanini, Fancelli, Capoul, Agnesi, Rota, and Borella. Mr. Cusins was conductor.

A CONCERT was given on Wednesday evening in aid of the Organ Fund for St. Paul's Church, Harrow Road, under the direction of Dr. Charles Verrinder, and by kind permission of Mrs. Allcroft, in her mansion at Lancaster Gate. Although we cannot speak in detail of the programme, which promised no less than thirty-three pieces, we may say in general that it was very well arranged, and the performance, entrusted partly to amateurs and partly to professional artists, afforded unanimous satisfaction. The Misses Ferrari's fine voices and exquisite singing were greatly admired in a duet by Rubinstein, "The Angels." Miss Sophie Ferrari, also, was warmly applauded in a clever song by her sister, "Placido Zeffiretto." Madame Elwood was very successful in Pergolese's "Sanctum et terrible," and so was Miss Matilda Scott in Haydn's "With verdure clad," and a ballad by Dr. Verrinder, "The tale he told me." Miss Annie Robinson sang Mozart's "Laudate Dominum" with much success, as did Mr. R. E. Webster Rossini's "Pro peccatis," and Mr. J. Freeman Mendelssohn's "If with all your hearts." Mr. G. A. Osborne played a Nocturne by Chopin, and an effective composition of his own in artistic style, and Mr. Oberthür produced great effect in two of his popular harp solos, "Meditation" and "Clouds and Sunshine." Dr. Charles Verrinder conducted with great efficiency, and the performances of his choral society deserve particular praise. Amongst those were Mozart's "Ave verum," Haydn's motet, "The arm of the Lord," and Mendelssohn's "Farewell to the forest." Nor must we omit the very remarkable performance of an amateur violin player, J. F. Rougement, Esq., who gave Vieuxtemp's "Reverie" in so finished a manner as to elicit general applause. The concert was very numerously attended, and we trust the object in view has been realized.

THE concert given by Mr. Sidney Smith in the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday week, was attended by a full and fashionable audience. Schumann's "Noble Esprit" and Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side" were charmingly rendered by Mdlle. Nita Gaetano. "The Glove" (Mdme. Dolby) was sung by Mdme. Lancia, and repeated in response to an encore. Mdme. Patey contributed "Nevermore" (F. Stanislaus) and "Sweet and Low" (Wallace), singing both in her best style and with the usual result—encores. M. Jules Lefort and Signor Caravoglia were also very successful in the songs they contributed. Beethoven's "Andante con variazioni" (Kreutzer Sonata) was capitally played by Mr. S. Smith and Herr Straus, and met with deserved applause, as did the playing of Chopin's La Gaite, for piano and violoncello, by Messrs. Smith and Pezze. The concert-giver brought forward several of his own popular pianoforte solos, among them being Ripples on the Lake, Rose Leaves, and a grand fantasia on airs from La Prophète. In all these pieces Mr. Smith appeared to great advantage, both as a composer and as an executant, and met with warm and merited applause. The accompanist was Herr Ganz.

MISS EDWARDS' matinée musicale took place on Tuesday, at Cromwell Gardens (by kind permission of Lord and Lady Clarence Paget), and was numerously and fashionably attended. Miss Edwards was assisted by Madame Torriani, who sang successfully "Casta Diva," and the sparkling bolero, from the Vèpres Siciliennes. Miss Purdy, the young and rising contralto, was greatly applauded in Cowen's "Marguerite," and a charming new song of Miss Edwards', "Gone like the Snows." Mr. Pyatt's voice was much admired in Mozart's "Qui sdegno," and a song by Schubert. Signor Monari Rocca was in the programme, but like our accomplished clariontettist friend, Mr. Lazarus, did not make his appearance. Since the art has not yet been invented of being in two places at once, and some artists are much engaged at present, it is not to be wondered at that such occurrences happen now and then. However, as it was, the programme was sufficiently long. Miss Edwards' own vocal contributions afforded general satisfaction; she sang the romance from Guillaume Tell, "Selva Opaca;" "Connais-tu le pays," from A. Thomas's Mignon, and two songs by Gounod and Moore, besides taking part in a quartet of her own composition, "Harmony, lov'd Harmony," in which the tenor part was sung by Mr. Frank Elmore, who also gave Signor Tito Mattei's "Non è ver," and a song by Stella. The instrumental solos were an andante and bolero for violin and piano, capitally played by Mdlle. Castellan and the composer, Chevalier de Kontski, who played his fantasia on Persian airs. Miss Edwards also appeared as a pianist, playing Schumann's "Nachtstück," and one of the late Cipriani Potter's "Pezze di Bravura," with finished taste. Mr. Oberthür had great success in his clever harp solo, "Clouds and Sunshine." By particular request he also played his graceful solos, "La Cascade," and "La Sylphide." The matinée finished with Mr. Oberthür's brilliant duet on Lucrezia Borgia, carefully executed by Miss Edwards and the composer. Herr Lehmeyer was the conductor, and a most efficient one. Other conductors named on the programme were conspicuous by their absence."

A CONCERT was given by Herr Lehmeyer at Addison College, Notting Hill (by permission of Miss Lewis) on Thursday evening last, and attracted a good audience. The artists were Miss Reives, Miss A. Goodall, Mr. B. Lane, and Signor Adelman, vocalists; the Misses Ehrenberg and Mr. Otto Booth instrumentalists. The concert commenced with Dussek's Sonata in B flat, for piano and violin, played by Messrs. Lehmeyer and Booth. Miss Reives sang "Killarney" (Balfe) and "The Shadow Song" from Dinorah, and was much applauded. She also joined Miss A. Goodall and Mr. Lane in Balfe's terzetto, "I am not the Queen" (encored). Miss Goodall obtained an encore for her rendering of "Clouds" (Mirana), as did Mr. B. Lane in Sullivan's "Once again." One of Hummel's rondos for four hands was acceptably played by the Misses Ehrenberg. The bénéficiaire contributed several pianoforte solos, doing so in such a manner as to elicit the warm applause of the audience. Herr Henseler was the accompanist.

A VERY good display of pianoforte playing was given at Miss Florence Ashe's morning concert in Willis's Rooms, when Miss Ashe was supported by Mr. Charles Hallé, Herr Straus, Mdlle. Torriani, Mdlle. Macvitz, and Signor Del Puente. Miss Ashe has evidently studied in a good school, her touch is firm, her tempi are accurate, her manipulative skill is remarkable alike for dexterity and correctness, and her reading of the masters' works strict and legitimate. These qualities were displayed in Schubert's G major sonata, and Bach's prelude and Fugue (C minor), Beethoven's sonata in E flat for piano and violin, with Herr Straus, and Mozart's double-handed sonata in D, with Mr. Hallé. So much applause followed the latter morceau that the two executants perforce returned to the platform and bowed their acknowledgments. Herr Straus also played a suite de pièces, cantabile, menuet, gavotta, and giga, by Veracini, with his usual breadth of tone and faultless execution. Of the vocalists, beyond saying that they sang well-known airs, and rendered them capably, nothing need be added.

MDLLE. NATALIE CAROLA'S matinée musicale at Dudley House, numerously and fashionably attended, afforded general satisfaction. The programme was excellent, and the artists were equally so. The vocalists were Mdlle. Marie Roze, Mdlle. Natalie Carola, Mdme. Patey, Mdlle. Bunsen, Signor Naudin, Signor Urio, M. Jules Lefort, and Signor Agnesi. Violin, Mr. Colyns; harp, Mr. Oberthür; piano, Signor Mattei and Mr. F. Cowen. The fair bénéficiaire's own contributions were chiefly Sir M. Costa's fine aria, "Dall' asilo della pace," in which she enjoyed the rare distinction of being accompanied by Sir Michael himself, and which was unanimously and deservedly encored, the same compliment being also awarded to her after singing one of Schubert's songs. We have not space to go into further details. Enough, that all the singers named above acquitted themselves admirably, and received the fullest appreciation. The same may be said about Mr. Colyns, Signor Mattei, and Mr. F. Cowen, who played a nocturne by Chopin and a charming composition of his own. Mr. Oberthür's harp solo, "Clouds and Sunshine," was also highly appreciated, as well as his duo on the Huguenots, for harp and piano, in which he was most ably assisted by Herr Ganz. The conductors were Herr Ganz, Signors Vera, Alary, and Visetti.

DARMSTADT.—The Grand-Duke has bestowed various marks of his favour on the artist-visitors who took part in the festival performances of the 17th June. Herr Betz, of Berlin, and Herr Franz Nachbaur, of Munich, received the knight's cross, first class, of the Order of Merit of Philip the Magnanimous, while to Mdme. Mathilde Mallinger was presented the Gold Medal of Merit for Art and Science.

PROVINCIAL.

EXETER.—On Monday evening last the Theatre Royal opened under the management of the veteran actor, Mr. E. D. Davis, for a series of six performances. A translation of Centenaire, under the Anglicised title of The Power of the Heart, has been played to numerous and highly appreciative audiences, the principal rôle being admirably sustained by Mr. E. D. Davis. Shipmates, a pretty "comedy drama," has nightly brought the entertainments to a conclusion, and in this Miss Tilly Wright's singing of Mr. Frederick Clay's ballad, "Lover Mine," has occasioned an unusual amount of enthusiasm. Miss Marie Glynne, Miss Kate Varley, Mr. Gerald Eyre, Mr. Dennis Coyne, Mr. F. B. Marshall, Mr. G. S. Titheradge, and Mr. Sidney Davis, represent the remaining principals. The new scenery is by Mr. T. Miller, while the musical department is under the direction of Mr. Charles Siddell.—Among the members of Mr. E. D. Davis's corps dramatique there is a young artist named Tilly Wright, whose ballad singing is most admirable. Her voice is a soprano, somewhat lacking in power, but with the rare and lovely tone sympathetique largely developed. Added to this, though her executive method is by no means of a first-rate description, she uses her voice with great taste and judgment, and, as a concert-balladist, would prove an invaluable addition to that department.—W. S. J.

NARBERTH.—A concert of sacred and other music was lately given in the National Schoolroom, under the auspices of the Wesleyan Methodist Society of this town, to the funds of which the proceeds will be devoted. The vocal and instrumental music was of a high order. The attendance was good. Mr. C. V. Harding (organist of St. Peter's, Carmarthen) and the Tenby Choir assisted. The instrumentalists were Miss M. A. Davies, Pembroke Dock, Miss Gibbs, Tenby, and Mr. Harding. The services of Mr. Geo. James, professor of music of this town, were also availed of. The audience evinced great interest in the performance throughout the evening.

BRISTOL.—The South Wales Choral Union, comprising 500 members, stopped on Tuesday at Bristol, on their way to London, to compete for the "grand prize" at the National Music Meetings, held this week at the Crystal Palace. They gave a concert in the afternoon as well as in the evening, at the Colston Hall, which was crammed. The first part of the programme consisted of the pieces they were to sing at the Crystal Palace, and the compositions were all those of the old masters, viz., Handel, Bach, Cherubini, Beethoven and Mendelssohn. The second part was miscellaneous, and consisted chiefly of Welsh compositions. Among other pieces was Mr. Brinley Richard's part song, "The hills resound," which was unanimously encored. The composer, who had come from London expressly for the occasion, accompanied the vocalists on the pianoforte, and was warmly greeted by the choir. The concert concluded with Mr. Brinley Richards' "God bless the Prince of Wales."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

THE CROWN DIAMONDS.

Little boys wet their hands before receiving the whack of the schoolmaster, and the Sunday Times, before administering castigation in re the Crown Diamonds thus tempered the back that was to bear it:—

"We have every desire to be thankful for the small mercies which operatic managers now bestow. We know the difficult position they occupy, subject to the despotism of the prima donna on the one hand, weighted by public indifference to novelty on the other, and girded at on all sides by critics whose business it is to apply goads in the cause of art. An impresario of the present day does not occupy the softest seat in the world, and it is only fair to make every allowance for him, and to put the most generous construction upon his actions. The wonder is that he attempts anything in the matter of producing novelty. Poor man! He has, it may be, to pay two hundred guineas every time his prima donna sings; and to keep up a 'double company' because his doors are always open, so that neither the resources for 'mounting' novelties, nor the time to rehearse them, are at command. When, in the face of all this, he really achieves a new thing, let us applaud him as one who overcomes difficulties, and not look too closely at the manner in which he does it. But with all our desire to act generously, it is impossible wholly to approve the fashion in which Auber's Diamans de la Couronne has been produced at Covent Garden."

THE TREMOLO.

Against this fashionable vice the Musical Standard has just spoken out with force and sharpness. Our contemporary observes:—

"Originating, probably, in the natural and unaffected pathos of a singer excited by intense dramatic feeling, musical performers were not slow in making use of so valuable an ally to heighten the effect of their own performances. Its power of giving a thrilling intensity to the voice was soon appreciated by all vocalists, but abuse soon followed. Sopranos and tenors were not permitted to monopolise the vibrato, altos and basses quickly asserted their claims to the use of the novelty, and, from a slight tremulous pause on some notes in certain positions in the scale, it degenerated into a lachrymose trembling on every note to be sung. Had we space, many absurd instances of this vice might be given. To mention one. Not long ago, we heard a gentleman—a foreign singer whose name matters not—sing a whole cantata through at the Albert Hall in this detestable style. Every note this person sang was given vibrato, and the effect to the unfortunate audience was painful and irritating to the last degree. Singers who suffer from this species of asthma, and cannot really control their voices, should at once cease to appear before the public. The tremolo then naturally spread to soloists on the violin, and all other members of the stringed family. Then (facilis decensus Averni) all kinds of wind instruments followed suit. Now it seems to be indispensable even to the ophicleide. The sluggish vibrations of this unwieldy instrument, whose best endeavours to attain the pathetic get no nearer than a wobble, remind us of Bottom's speech, 'I will aggravate my voice, so that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an't were any nightingale.' We once heard a player on the gentle ophicleide endeavour to show his love-sick passion in Handel's bold 'O ruddier than the cherry;' the effect was most grotesque, and certainly would not have helped on the suit of the giant. Your street cornet player is great in the tremolo; sometimes we fairly suspect that extra deep potations are its primary cause, rather than a question of artistic fitness. But the abuse of the tremolo is not confined to soloists. The disease has spread over the whole orchestra, so that it may now be seen and heard shivering all together to such an extent that the uninitiated might fancy the whole body to be stricken with a palsy or St. Vitus dance."

THE SHAH AT HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

The entertainment prepared for the Shah, by command of the Queen, on Friday night week, at Her Majesty's Opera, included the first act of the Traviata, the second (third ?) of La Favorita, and the first act of Mignon. In the opera of Verdi the chief characters were assigned to Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (Violetta) and Signor Campanini (Alfredo); in that of Donizetti, to Mdlle. Tietjens (Leonora), Signor Aramburo (Fernando), Signor Rota (Alfonso XI.), and Signor Medini (Baldassare); in that of M. Ambroise Thomas, to Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (Mignon), Mdlle. Carlotta Grossi (Felina), Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini (Federico), Signor Castelmary (Lothario), Signor Rinaldini (Laertes), and M. Capoul (Wilhelm Meister). Sir Michael Costa presided in the orchestra, and the performance was in all respects excellent. Although the representation was "by command," there was no attempt at State ceremony, and no decorations to speak of were attempted. Four double boxes in the "grand tier" and two in the first tier were fitted up for the accommodation of the Shah and his retinue. The distinguished party did not arrive till the act from the Traviata had come to an end, and that from the Favorita had begun. Then Signor Aramburo, who was in the midst of a recitative, had suddenly to stop. The eagerly expected visitors had arrived. The Shah and the Prince of Wales took their seats alone in the grand tier box nearest the stage—the Grand Vizier being, as usual, in attendance—and the other boxes were speedily filled. In one of the upper tier of boxes was the brother of the Shah; but the entire absence of ladies imparted a somewhat gloomy effect to the whole.

At the termination of the Traviata, the "Persian March," of which we have lately heard so much (and which is built upon a melody from one of the operas of Glinka), was performed on the stage by a contingent from the military band, directed by Mr. F. Godfrey. The act of the Favorita was then gone through, with the introduction of an incidental ballet (conducted by Mr. Weist Hill), in which Mdlle. Ricois was the principal dancer. During the performance of Mignon the Duke of Edinburgh entered the box of the Shah, and the Prince of Wales retired. When the curtain fell on this act, the familiar strains of the National Anthem were unexpectedly heard; His Majesty the Shah, after briefly, but courteously, acknowledging the applause of the audience, immediately left the box with the Duke of Edinburgh, the Persian retinue, of course, following. The gas was then put out, and the promised second act of Mignon omitted. But, as it was half-past 11 when the first act of Mignon was over, and the Shah was evidently fatigued, no one found his sudden departure extraordinary, and no one could reasonably complain. The entertainment in fact, though well varied and attractive, was decidedly too long for such a special occasion.

After the Favorita, His Majesty sent for Mdme. Christine Nilsson, and expressed his regret at not having been able to arrive in time for the Traviata. Mdme. Nilsson, who had been resplendent in beauty and diamonds, was compelled to appear before the Shah in her Mignon rags, but he admired her all the same.

A PAPER ON THE HARMONIUM.

SHOWING THAT IT IS A DISTINCT INSTRUMENT OF MUSIC POSSESSING MANY BEAUTIES TOO LITTLE APPRECIATED, AND THAT IF IT WERE PROPERLY PLAYED AND STUDIED IT WOULD BE FOUND TO BE THE MOST PLEASING AND VARIED INSTRUMENT FOR THE PURPOSE OF DOMESTIC MUSICAL RECREATION THAT EXISTS.

Prejudice is the bane of pleasure, as well as of the more serious matters of life.

The bigotry of prejudice has condemned the harmonium, as it has also condemned the English Opera, but both exist, and must, and will, outlive prejudice, as everything that is noble and grand always does. The stage has gloriously fought its way against the tide. Italian Opera is doing the same. English Opera has fared worse; but it is not yet ousted: nor will it ever be so. The organ and harmonium have suffered more than all.

The organ is condemned to be used for specified purposes, and for a specified class of music; while the harmonium is insulted by being used as a deputy for an organ, and played only in charity schools and small chapels.

Very rarely is it that we hear an organ well played, and its various beauties properly shown forth with all its effects and combinations. Few people who play the organ seem to be aware of the fact that they are controlling a large orchestra. Does it ever strike people that in playing a harmonium they are manipulating a small one? Of course, those people who estimate the worth and grandeur of an orchestra in proportion to its numerical strength, will not appreciate the orchestral qualities of the harmonium. Now, it is a remarkable fact that the majority of organ-players make a great noise on the instrument and seem to fancy that the more noise they do make the greater will be the effect. They are wrong! Seldom is the organ properly played. Never is the harmonium done justice to except by its actual professors. Only one word can adequately express the character of the noise produced by the majority of performers on the harmonium; that word is "infernal."

The most melancholy droning spasmodic dirge is produced, for each action of the foot upon the bellows produces a throb of sound which is inexpressibly painful, and calculated to afflict any tolerably sensitive person with a terrible fit of the "Blues." Yet these persons, having religiously (?) groaned through several melancholy hymns and chants, confidently assert that they "can play the harmonium." People who know nothing about the matter, having listened to the doleful performance, immediately express their opinion that the harmonium is a harsh noisy instrument, unsuitable for playing good music, in private, though it may do as a makeshift for an organ in a church or in schools.

Now the harmonium, properly played, discourses soft, sweet and melting tones, composing gay or sad melodies as the case may be. It is equally suitable to depict light mirth and merriment, or solemn and religious harmony—thus, combining the whole range of dramatic music, which it endows with the most exquisite shades of feeling and expression.—It can be played so softly as not to fill more than a small sized-room with sound, and that sound ever varying—not monotonous.

The harmonium, labouring under the ill treatment of the ordinary player, buzzes angrily when supposed to be soft and sweet in tone, and shrieks, groans and moans alternately when supposed to be grand and religious. But such is not the true nature of the instrument. The harmonium is a distinct instrument, separate in itself and not to be confounded or mixed up with those mongrel instruments, piano-harmoniums, American organs, etc.

The magic appliance that elevates this instrument in one respect, even above the organ, and enables it so exquisitely to express the feelings embodied in an orchestral piece, melody or harmony, is the EXPRESSION STOP. This is the heart and the soul of the instrument, without which it is but a bundle of reeds vibrated by a pair of bellows, sounded by a valve opened by a mechanical contrivance.

Never, on any pretence whatever, should the harmonium be played without the expression stop being in full action. It is this wonderful appliance which renders it possible to produce shades and breathings of expression that cannot be obtained on any other SOLO instrument.

The human voice alone can excel it, an exquisitely played piano may approach it, but an organ never can in the matter of graduated expression.

Now the attainment of a proper mastery over the expression stop is the one great and important difficulty to be met with in studying the harmonium—but once conquered, all is over as far as knowledge of the mode of producing the rising swell in the sound: but it is impossible to teach the player the soul of expression that is in the human soul itself. Whatever internal feelings he or she may entertain about the subject they are musically illustrating, those feelings he or she will endeavour to actually impart to the sounds they mechanically produce. The poetical feeling of music must be innate,—it may be cultivated; but it cannot be taught by mere word of mouth or example.

People should not despair about the harmonium. If they would take half the trouble to learn it that they do to learn the piano all would be well. In the case of the pianoforte mere mechanical execution will pass muster with brilliant effect, but in the harmonium the mere mechanical power only produces a noise. Taste, feeling, and refinement in the player are necessary to mould that noise into music.

And now a few words as to the advantages to be gained by learning and using constantly the harmonium as an instrument of domestic musical recreation.

The one great advantage in the harmonium is that you can get something like a respectable effect for orchestral music. Why? Because the harmonium is a combination (like the organ) of orchestral instruments.

Now every real and true artist of the pianoforte knows that the beauty of piano playing rests in the fingers of the player, all expression, all taste lies in them; but the piano is a solo instrument, and requires, in order to fully develop its integral beauties, music expressly written for it alone, like the pianoforte music of Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Haydn, Schubert, Clementi, &c. To play orchestral music on a piano is nonsense, and, moreover, damages, not only the style of the player but the instrument itself. Why? Because the arrangement of the orchestral music is extremely heavy; the endeavours to obtain certain loud crashes, heavy harmonies, drum effects, &c., causes the music to be very hard to play, and exceedingly unsatisfactory, inducing as it does playing from the shoulder, banging, and a general violence of action and treatment utterly unsuitable to the temper of the instrument and to the requisite grace of the player. Besides it is attempting to do an irregular thing to obtain an orchestral effect on a solo instrument.

The piano, properly played, with its proper individual music, is, perhaps, the most beautiful of all purely solo instruments; in fact it may be said to be the king of solo instruments. But its true beauties can never be properly seen or appreciated as long as its individuality is destroyed.

Now to play orchestral music on the harmonium is perfectly legitimate and thoroughly satisfactory in effect. The author will just state, in conclusion, the great pleasure he himself derives from his own harmonium. He goes to the theatre and hears a magnificent opera—say Il Trovatore, La Traviata, Lucrezia, or Norma. Then, next day, he plays the opera he has heard the night before, all through, from overture to finale, recalling vividly to himself all the beautiful scenes contained in the plot, and all the dramatic power of the music. Surely this is pure pleasure. Dear readers, do not let your prejudice be the means of depriving you of it.

In another paper I may, perhaps, presume to dilate upon certain modes of producing especial effects, and upon certain improvements which I fancy could be carried out in the instrument itself. No instrument is more open to improvements, but until it becomes more popular, and the demand for it is greater, it will not pay harmonium makers to endeavour to improve, as those improvements, if real, would involve greater cost in construction and consequently increase the saleable value. The author only humbly hopes that his few words may do something towards calling a little kindness and attention to a poor, ill-used, unappreciated, musical instrument.

ORGAN NEWS.

The great transept organ at St. Paul's Cathedral is now being removed by Bryceson Brothers, previous to completion at their factory and re-erection in the Victoria Assembly Rooms, Clifton, Bristol. London will therefore loose one of its largest and finest organs, and this magnificent instrument will again be devoted to orchestral and secular music, as at the Panopticon, for which institution it was built in 1853.

The large organ in Christ Church, Clifton, Bristol, lately much damaged by the falling of the pinnacles from the tower, during a storm, has now been completely restored and considerably enlarged by Messrs. Bryceson. Also a richly decorated organ, with two manuals and mediæval case, has been erected by the same builders in Emmanuel Church, Clifton.

THE SHAH.

Sir Joseph Dickson, the Shah's Physician, has just sent the Senior Surgeon of the British Hospital for Skin Diseases the following letter:—

"Buckingham Palace, July 5th, 1873.

"My dear Sir,—I am authorized by the Grand Vizier to inform you that His Majesty the Shah of Persia has graciously consented to become Patron of the British Hospital for Diseases of the Skin in Great Marlborough Street.—Believe me to be, yours very truly,

"Balmanno Squire, Esq., M.B., Lond." "J. R. L. Dickson.

It is not unlikely that the special prevalence of the more fatal forms of leprosy in Persia may be the cause of the Shah's benevolent interest in the "lepers" of this country. Moreover, the Shah (like the Prince of Wales) not long since was indebted for his life to the resources of medical art.

MADAME JUDIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Mr. Editor,—Business having detained me in town, I succeeded in getting my favourite stall at the Princess's, to hear Mdme. Judic in Le Mouton Enragée, ne me Chatouillez pas, &c. Mdme. Judic's vocal powers are of the smallest, but, barring that, the new-comer has a certain verve and originality which is very taking. Her acting, if not of the highest order, has many good points about it, and her facial expression is something marvellous. Du reste, Mdme. Judic has a handsome person; and the public will not be sorry to see an actress about whom such a furore has been made in Paris. I am, dear Mr. Editor, Yours faithfully, A Rustic.

July 9th, 1873.

Lines for Music.

WATCHING.

A Serenade.

I.

The night is dark, the winds moan low
Amidst the spectral trees,
And ghostly voices come and go
Upon the evening breeze.
My heart feels sad when not with thee,
Though 'tis but night divides us twain,
When she has fled, once more I'll be,
Beloved, at thy side again.
Now lightnings play, and storm-clouds chase
Each other, cross the summer sky;
Though storm and tempest rage apace,
Till ruddy sunrise, here watch I.

II.

The night has flown, and with her all
That tells of dark despair—
The gay birds on each other call,
And cleave the morning air.
A hundred flow'rs and waving plants
Here wait to kiss thy tender feet;
A thousand raindrops, sparkling, dance
When thy sweet smile they soon shall meet.
There's but one void my heart feels here,
If thou wert by, no more 'twould be—
My watch is o'er, the time draws near,
Awake then, wake, and fly with me!

AM I TO DIE FROM NEGLECT?

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Wandering alone about Covent Garden Market (the refuge for outcasts) I was attracted by the play-bill hanging upon the walls of the Theatre, announcing the "State visit of the Shah." I hovered about my former home, jostled and trodden upon by the vulgar crowd, until the great potentate arrived, followed by princes, peers, nobles, and the wealthiest of the land. The sight brought tears—bitter, bitter tears—to my eyes as I looked on and thought of the position I once held upon the very stage that was to be occupied by foreign talent, and brought before the "King of Kings," who has been shown everything English but "English Opera." At both our national theatres he saw nothing but foreign talent. As I returned to "my lodging upon the cold ground" I, for once, gave up to despair of ever holding any position again; and, while all the leading composers and professors look upon my fallen state with such perfect apathy, and the patrons (!) of musical talent treat me with such profound contempt, I see no hope; I shall be left to die from sheer neglect of those whose duty it is at least to try what can be done for yours obediently, Miss English Opera.

Doorstep, Opera Colonnade.

Innsbruck.—Programme of the second Musical Festival given by the Musical Union on the 25th and 26th June, in the Imperial and National Theatre. First Day. Elijah, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; solo singers: Madame Sophie Förster and Madame Sophie Diez, from the Royal Opera, Munich, Herr Max Hubert, from Munich, and Herr Julius Stockhausen, from Stuttgart. Director, Herr M. Nagiller. Orchestral Conductor, Herr Jos. Alliani. Chorus and orchestra comprised about 300 members. Second Day. Symphony in C, No. 4 (Jupiter Symphony), W. A. Mozart. Scena and Aria, "Ah, Perfido!" L. van Beethoven (sung by Madame Sophie Förster). Three Songs: "Volkslied," Franz Wüllner; "Wiegenlied," Johannes Brahms; "Mailied," Bernhard Scholz (sung by Madame Sophie Diez). Aria from the opera of Ezio, G. F. Handel (sung by Herr Julius Stockhausen). Adagio from the Symphony in C major (No. 7, according to Breitkopf und Härtel), J. Haydn. Aria and Duet from Euryanthe, C. M. von Weber (sung by Madame Förster and Herr Max Hubert). Aria from Judas Maccabœus, G. F. Handel (sung by Madame Sophie Diez). Two Songs: "Greisengesang," and "Geheimes"—with orchestral accompaniment by Herr Johannes Brahms—Franz Schubert (sung by Herr Julius Stockhausen). Overture to Egmont, L. van Beethoven. [A wholesome programme.—A.S.S.]

Merseburg.—The grand vocal and organ concerts given for many years past in the Cathedral, under the direction of Herr Engel, are now well-known throughout musical Germany, while in Thuringia itself they have assumed the character of popular festivals, attracting the lovers of high-class sacred music from far and wide. The last concert was no exception to its predecessors. It opened with a performance by Herr Bartmuss of J. S. Bach's Prelude in G major. The same gentleman played the Abbate Franz Liszt's "Ave, Maria," arranged for the organ by Gottschalg. Herr Grothe played J. S. Bach's "Toccata dorica" and Fugue in G minor, with wonderful clearness and spirit, a noteworthy fact, if he is, as stated, only seventeen years of age. The Leipsic Choral Union, under the direction of Herr Vogel, sang the "Kyrie eleison," from the Abbate Franz Liszt's Messa Choralis, and Richter's setting of the Twenty-second Psalm. Herr Raabe, on the violin, and Herr Vogel, on the organ, performed an Adagio by Beethoven and the "Abendlied," by Robert Schumann. [An unwholesome programme.—A.S.S.]

A Treat.—Writing to the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, of music and musicians in the capital of Saxony, Herr Emil Naumann says: "The more intolerable, with the present heat, when all one's windows are open, is the pianomania, which has here assumed the character of an epidemic. Dresden is not only, par excellence, a city for foreigners, but it is, moreover, blessed more than any other with young ladies' boarding schools. Owing to the presence of so many pianoforte-playing damsels, belonging to Russia, Poland, and England as much as to Germany, it is by no means a rare occurrence for a person to enjoy a treat like that with which I am favoured, as I write these lines. I can hear simultaneously Mendelssohn's March from the Midsummer Night's Dream, Wagner's 'Kirchgang' from Lohengrin, and a Polonaise by Chopin!" How delightful!

Kissingen.—Herren Rudolf Engelhardt, of Munich, and Hermann Zimmer, of Berlin, gave a concert lately in the Conversationssaal, to a highly appreciative though scanty audience. The first gentleman sang compositions by various composers, from Handel to R. Wagner, while his companion, a pupil of Herr Hans von Bülow, was equally eclectic on the piano, favouring his hearers with specimens of Bach and Beethoven, of Schumann, Chopin, and Herr R. Wagner.

WAIFS.

Si non e vero, &c.—Some days ago the officers of the Brighton Aquarium received a letter or telegram, or both, stating that at the house of a gentleman living at some hours railway journey, was a Sea Serpent at the disposal of the Aquarium Company. It was described as being about eight feet long when stretched fully out, and as emitting sounds when touched or pressed upon by the fingers of anyone in a certain manner. Its greatest diameter was stated as about four inches. Under ordinary circumstances this would, by a naturalist, be taken for a great freshwater eel, or a small conger eel; but the emission of sound was the remarkable part of the matter, and this induced the Aquarium people to take much trouble and to make great preparations for its safe transmission to Brighton. They accordingly went to fetch the creature, and, on presenting themselves at the house of the gentleman, he repudiated the whole thing! After talking it over, however, he hit upon its solution, and said that his son played on the Serpent, and it was about four inches in diameter, and measured about eight feet long if fully stretched out, and, of course, it did give forth sounds when one's fingers pressed upon it! So the naturalist people went home sold! The whole thing is rather neat, but many people will be surprised at so obsolete an instrument now being played upon, as one associates it with marine-store shops at the back of St. James's Park, where they may be often seen hanging up for sale for any small sum they will bring. The Serpent is, for all that, very dear in my remembrance of it, when as a lad I heard it played upon in military orchestras, which once furnished my only chance of hearing a little good music.—L.

Signor and Madame Verdi are still in Paris.

The French papers say that Madame Patti has taken a villa near Paris for the autumn.

Signor Rossi, who succeeded Mercadante as director of the Naples Conservatoire, has just died, aged sixty-three.

Mr. Oberthür's overture, Rübezahl, will be one of the novelties shortly to be performed at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. J. Barnby.

M. Gounod's articles in Le Ménéstrel on the Compositeurs chefs d'orchestre are to be answered by M. Charles Dancla, professor at the Conservatoire.

Mdlle. Bertha Brousil, the talented violinist, is meeting with great success in America; the New York, Boston, and U.S. papers speak very highly of her playing.

The Grand Opera appears in the new French budget for a subvention of 800,000 francs; the Opéra Comique for 140,000 francs; and the Théâtre Italien for 100,000 francs.

Signor Tamberlik, the renowned Italian tenor, has sent 1000 francs to the fund for Frederick Lemaitre. Bravo! Signor Tamberlik ("whose feats did the famed fly in amber lick"!).

There have been some débuts in Paris recently. Mdlle. Isaac appeared at the Opéra Comique in La Fille du Regiment; Mdlle. Franck appeared in Galathée; and a new tenor, M. Dekéghel, in La Dame Blanche.

We hear that Mr. Philip Klitz, of Great Malvern, is at work on a new cantata, The Viking, the libretto having been written by Mrs. Eliza F. Morris. It is hoped that it will be ready by this present autumn.

Miss Therèse Liebe, the accomplished young violinist, has returned from her ten months' tour in the United States, where, as our readers have read from time to time in this journal, she made a decided impression, so much so that the fair artist is engaged in the States, in September, for another lengthened tour.

Referring to the competition of trumpet-players at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday last, although it is a matter for regret that only two performers competed, it is worthy remark that the trumpets upon which they performed were both manufactured by Messrs. Köhler & Son, the musical instrument makers, of Covent Garden.

The report, in the Italian and French journals, that Signor Arditi is a candidate for the post of "Chef d'orchestre" at Genoa, left vacant by the death of Mariani, is without foundation. Signor Arditi, we are authorised to state, has never even contemplated anything of the kind. His engagements at St. Petersburgh and Vienna fully occupy his winter seasons.

The Court of Common Council of the city of London, on the motion of Mr. John Bath, met lately to consider and report to the court upon "the best means of providing musical performances in the Guildhall, or in any other way of patronising the service of music in the city of London for the public benefit." The motion was refered to the general purposes committee to report upon to the Court.

Aim at originality; cut and prune what you have rather than transplant foreign plants, to run the risk of their premature death.

An ungallant New York journalist says of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society: "They are a homely set, but they can sing!"

National Music Meetings.—The "challenge cup" was again carried off by the South Wales choir on Thursday, at the Crystal Palace. The only other competitor was the Tonic Sol-fa choir.

Nathaniel Hawthorne's birthplace in Salem, Mass., sold at auction for $2,375. The house is described as a weather-beaten structure, low, two stories, with a gambrel roof, and one monstrous chimney in the middle. The room in which Hawthorne was born in the northeast chamber is a small room, with an open fireplace for a wood fire. The house is now occupied by two American families, but the neighbourhood is not the choicest.

At the rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, by the Boston Handel and Haydn Society in New York, the conductor's stand gave way, conductor, bâton, and music falling to the floor. Very soon the jolly face of Theodore Thomas appeared on the stage, and he laughingly remarked that every time the Ninth Symphony was performed there must be a breakdown, and he preferred to do it himself rather than that the chorus or orchestra should do it.

It is with regret we record the death of Mr. William Miller, organist of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He was the first organist of the Sacred Harmonic Society, a post which he held for some thirteen years, and has been organist of St. Giles, Cripplegate, since 1832, when he was selected from 19 candidates. As a musician he ranked high, and was considered an excellent player of the Handelian School. He was also a frequent contributor to the columns of the City Press.

Pietro Locatelli, one of the most famous violinists, was born at Bergamo, according to M. Fétis, in 1693, according to other authorities, perhaps in certain matters even more trustworthy, in the early part of the 18th century. He studied under Corelli at Rome, but soon took a path of his own invention; and some critics insist that he was the violin composer to whom Paganini owed more than to any other. Locatelli died at Amsterdam, where he had for a long time resided, and where he was held in the highest esteem. The year of his death was 1764. He composed many works for his instrument, but few are now known, except to connoisseurs bent upon knowing everything.

The two little gems from Schubert's Manfred music proved exceedingly attractive,—especially the one which had also the interest of novelty: the "Incantation" (or "adjuration," Byron calls it) of the Witch of the Alps. This, which is No. 6 in the work, coming immediately after the Entr'acte (No. 5), forms an orchestral piece complete in itself, quite separable from the voice part, which merely declaims a few syllables melodramatically. It is as graceful, light and airy as Byron's conception of the "golden-haired spirit" summoned by his gloomy hero. The delicate little violin figures seem to float up and evaporate like mountain mist in the cold, clear upper air.—Dwight.

The Musical Committee of the Society of Arts have, as has been stated in previous reports, and in the chairman's address, received a very large amount of support in the way of scholarships promised for the establishment of a National Training School for Music. The Council of the Royal Albert Hall have promised the use of two of their smaller theatres, and other rooms, for the accommodation of students; and the committee are of opinion that the time has now arrived when the establishment of a National Training School for Music on an independent basis may be accomplished, and that for this purpose steps should be taken for erecting a building to be connected with the Albert Hall, suitable for the school. This proposition, with plans, and other details which have been ordered to be prepared, will, at a later date, come before the Council for their consideration.

The body of Prince Joseph Michel Xavier Francois Jean Poniatowski, Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, and a Senator of France under the Empire, was buried at Chislehurst, within a few feet of the chapel which is being built for the reception of the Emperor Napleon's remains, temporarily deposited in a vault on the other side of the Roman Catholic church. Prince Poniatowski, the representative of an ancient and illustrious Polish house, and warm adherent of the French Imperial dynasty, has, since the fall of Napoleon III., resided in London, where, like other persons of high birth and rank whose fortunes have suffered by the national convulsions of the past three years, he has bravely and honourably turned to account his talents as a musical composer. Little more than a week ago this accomplished gentleman was, or appeared to be, in the best health and spirits, and was enjoying the more refined amusements of the town with all the keen zest of an artist. He was yet many years short of the natural term of human life when thus suddenly called away from his labours and his worldly hopes and cares.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The Leierkasten, a club of musicians, have forwarded, through Herr Carl Haslinger, music-publisher of Vienna, a sum of 100 thalers for Madame Caroline van Beethoven. They intend shortly to add the proceeds of a concert they are about to get up.

SEVILLE.—The Concert Society, founded last year, is about to extend its sphere of action. This year it will give orchestral concerts in the Theatre under the direction of Señor Lopez Uria.

BOLOGNA.—The members of the orchestra at the Teatro del Corso have presented Signor Mercuri with a handsome ring as a token of regard and esteem.

BARCELONA.—Italian Opera has proved a failure this season at the Teatro Principale, and the management has become bankrupt.

TURIN.—The Society of Popular Concerts have suggested to the Municipality the propriety of giving a grand Musical Festival to celebrate the inauguration, in October, of the Cavour Monument.

ROME.—The Philharmonic Academy recently gave an interesting concert which opened with Weber's overture to Oberon. This was followed by a four part motet: "Adoramus," by Palestrina, magnificently given by the chorus; Beethoven's "Mignon," sung by Signorina Pia Pelissier; a four-part "Ave, Maria," by Orsini; and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, with orchestral accompaniment, the pianist being Signorina Giulia Decousandier. This concluded the first part. The principal feature in the second part was a ten-part madrigal entitled "Eco." It is by Luca Marenzio, a composer of the sixteenth century, born at Coccaglio, near Breschia. He was particularly celebrated for his madrigals, which gained him the title of "divine." He was chapelmaster to the King of Poland; but, being obliged on account of ill-health to leave that country, he came to Rome where he died. He was buried in the Church of San Lorenzo in Lucina. Signorina Decousandier performed the Abbate Franz Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody;" Signora Rossi and the chorus gave the contralto air from Gluck's Orfeo; the female chorus gave the bathing chorus from Les Huguenots; and the concert closed with the prayer from Rossini's Mosè.—The Municipal Council have voted a monument to Manzoni in the Capitol. A special committee of the Academy of Saint Cecilia and the Philharmonic Academy of Rome have commissioned each of the following gentlemen, Signori Bornia, Orsini, Sangiorgi, and Lucilla, to set a different piece of poetry by the deceased author, for performance at the inauguration of the monument.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 3s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books or Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system had met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalization, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Dispatch.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

HOW TO OBSERVE HARMONY, by JOHN CURWEN, with exercises in Analysis, the illustrations being printed in both Sol-fa and Staff Notations. This work contains the system on which the students have learnt who have been so successful in obtaining prizes and certificates in Mr. Hullah's Examination in the Theory of Music at the Society of Arts. Any one who plays the Chants and Hymn Tunes used for illustration in regular order, will soon notice that the easiest and commonest things in Harmony are shown first, and afterwards those which are more difficult. He will also hear that each new illustration introduces some new thing which has not been heard in any previous illustration. Thus the student, beginning with a chant formed by the Major Tonic and Dominant chords, passes on through the other chords of the scale, through all the varieties of passing tones, through the different sorts of Transition, through the peculiarities of the Minor mode, to a new theory of Discords, and a full exhibition of Chromatics. The work contains 236 illustrations, and 195 exercises in analysis. Price 2s., sent post free.—J. S. CURWEN, 8, Warwick Lane, London, E.C.

NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

These very interesting gatherings, which created so much excitement last year, and added materially to the influence the directors of the Crystal Palace delight to exercise upon the musical art, are, as might have been anticipated, renewed, and appear to enjoy an excellent chance of settling down into a permanent institution. The design, it need scarcely be said, originated with Mr. Willert Beale, whose long connexion with music and intercourse with professional artists afforded him an experience indispensable to its successful development. The scope and meaning of that design have been more than once explained; and it is enough to repeat that the principal object is to bring together choirs, solo singers, and bands of instrumental performers from all parts of the country in order to compete for prizes in a public arena, and thereby exhibit in friendly rivalry their various degrees of merit. A more fitting arena than the Handel orchestra of the Crystal Palace could hardly be imagined for the efficient realization of such a scheme; and through Mr. George Grove, the able and indefatigable secretary and manager, Mr. Beale has not only been afforded substantial aid, but in certain necessary details, valuable counsel. It is hardly so much for the competitions themselves, which depend upon a system of prizes for their earnest and zealous carrying out, that we feel it our duty to support these National Music Meetings, as for the possible, nay, probable results they may eventually bring about. That a vast deal of musical talent—perhaps, indeed, of musical genius, certainly of great musical promise—lies stagnant for want of the emulative stir of publicity cannot be denied; and, if out of some one of these meetings, a new Sims Reeves, Santley, Novello, or Sainton Dolby should crop up, the end will at once have justified the means. Moreover, who can be indifferent to the fact that among the miners and labourers of the Principality may be found an organized chorus capable of holding their own against the experienced vocalists of London, where, in certain instances, choral music has been brought almost to perfection? The mere thought of how these hardworked people employ their leisure hours is consoling to all who care for the welfare and happiness of their species. To reach anything like excellence in choral singing demands constant and assiduous practice, and thus hours are devoted by them to a pursuit which improves their moral feeling and raises their social status—hours which would otherwise be devoted to what might deteriorate the one and lower the other.

For such reasons, independent of art in the abstract, we are disposed to welcome a scheme tending to stimulate such people in their endeavours, and to make them endeavour to earn the sanction and approval of recognised judges. If it were necessary to establish the simple truth that England is not the "most unmusical country in the world," as some illustrious "virtuosi" have affirmed, that simple truth would be established by the fact that there is scarcely a considerable town in the kingdom where some kind of choral practice, or some kind of instrumental practice, does not take place at least once a week nearly all the year round. We have well-to-do amateurs who strive zealously in the cause; and we have also artisans and labourers out of number. No one knows this better than Mr. Willert Beale, and hence the confidence with which he has worked up to the actual point. In a sentence, the National Musical Meetings are calculated to effect a world of good in a particular direction, and therefore have a claim upon the help and countenance of philanthropists.

This year shows a marked advance on last year. The prize list is considerably extended. There are now no fewer than twelve classes of competitors, and not the least commendable addition is the admission of church and chapel choirs into the ranks. Three competitions for various choral bodies, four for solo vocalists, one for solo trumpets, and three for brass bands and bands of all instruments, are open. The solo voice competitions are for sopranos, contraltos, and mezzo-sopranos, tenors, baritones, and basses.

As was the case last summer, so is it now. Messrs. Grove and Beale have solicited and obtained the consent of some of the most eminent members of the musical profession to officiate as judges at the contests. At the first meeting, the sopranos, tenors, and juvenile wind bands contended. The judges, in the first instance, were Sir Julius Benedict, Signor Arditi, Messrs. John Hullah, Henry Leslie, and W. Ganz, who awarded the prize (30*l.*) to Miss Jessie Jones (pupil of Signor Randegger), and a certificate to Miss E. Tomsett. When the tenors had undergone their probation the same acute dispensers of the order of merit gave the prize (30*l.*) to Mr. Frank Gifford, and a certificate to Mr. Charles Wilkinson. In each the probationary tests were selected from a printed list by the judges themselves. The tribunal before which the juvenile bands had to exhibit was represented by Signor Arditi, Messrs. D. and F. Godfrey, whose award (after two trials) was in favour of the band of the Marylebone Schools, Southall. A purse of 25*l.* was the prize; but smaller prizes were allotted to the less successful bands. Where delegated professors of such experience have openly and frankly recorded their views, criticism would be out of order, more especially on such an occasion as the present, when, in several instances, the competitors had to try again, so as to fortify the umpires in their opinion. The Crystal Palace orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Manns, accompanied the vocal solos, and inaugurated the proceedings with Auber's characteristic overture to Le Cheval de Bronze. A concert, advertised to follow, did not take place, in consequence of the unexpected length to which the main proceedings had spun out. Moreover, the Shah of Persia —"metal more attractive" to the large majority—was wandering about the Palace and grounds. The second day's competition included contraltos, barytones, basses, and brass bands. Six contraltos appeared on the platform, from among whom Mr. Hullah, Mr. Leslie, and Signor Arditi delegated the prize (30*l.*) to Miss Bolingbroke. Six barytones and basses also came forward, Signor Arditi, Messrs. Leslie, J. Barnby, and Hullah selecting Mr. H. E. Thorndike for the prize (30*l.*). The three brass bands consisted of the Carrow Works, Norwich, the Royal Artillery, Woolwich, and the Volunteer Artillery, Gloucester. Messrs. Leslie, F. Godfrey, and Barnby conferred the first prize of 50*l.* upon the Woolwich Artillery; a B flat clarinet, the offering of Messrs. Besson & Co., being allotted to the Norwich (Carrow Works); and a library of music, the donation of Messrs. Chappell, to the Gloucester band. At the third meeting, choral bodies not exceeding 200 in number, church choirs and players on the trumpet solo were heard. Three choral societies—the Dalston Association, South London Association, and Stepney "Tonic Sol-fa" contended; the judges, Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs. H. Leslie and Barnby, awarding the chief prize (100*l.*) to the Stepney Association, the second prize, presented by Messrs. Boosey & Co.—a complete bound set of their "Royal Edition of Operas"—falling to the South London. This competition was made all the more interesting by a test of sight-singing. The champions of the solo trumpet were only two—Mr. W. Morrow, of the Grenadier Guards, and Mr. W. Wilmore, of the Crystal Palace band, who tried their skill in the well-known obbligato accompaniments to "The trumpet shall sound" and "Let the bright Seraphim" (Handel). Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. W. G. Cusins, and Signor Arditi assigned the first prize (25*l.*) to Mr. Wilmore, a "slide" trumpet, the donation of Messrs. Besson & Co., falling to his rival. In the other choral display there was no competition, and the prize of 50*l.* was awarded by Sir John Goss, Sir G. Elvey, and Mr. J. L. Hatton, to the choristers of St. Nicholas Church, Liverpool, who exhibited their powers in a Te Deum and Benedictus by Orlando Gibbons, and Dr. Croft's anthem, "God is gone up."

The fourth day was the most exciting of the series. It will be remembered what distinction the Cambrian singers earned last year; how, although they had no competitors, the Challenge Prize, value 1,000*l.*, was awarded to them by the judges; and how unanimously this decision was approved. Nevertheless, it was generally believed that when the Welsh choristers, and their conductor, Mr. Griffith Jones ("Caradoc"), presented themselves again to maintain their right still to hold the prize, they would meet with formidable competitors in some of our London or North England choirs. Expectation, however, was to be disappointed. The South Wales Choral Union again won the prize, which, however, was not on this occasion uncontested. Their opponents were some 300 members of the Tonic Sol-Fa Association, under the conduct of Mr. Proudman, one of its most zealous and distinguished leaders. The Welsh were 500 strong. It is therefore not surprising that in an arena so vast as that of the Central Transept, the extra 200, singing and shouting from the Handel Orchestra, should carry double weight. The pieces chosen for both choirs were J. S. Bach's motet, "I wrestle and pray;" the final chorus, "Hallelujah," from Beethoven's Mount of Olives; "See what love," from Mendelssohn's St. Paul; and "Come with torches brightly flashing," from the same composer's Walpurgis Night. The judges, Sir J. Benedict, Sir J. Goss, and Mr. Barnby, announced their decision in favour of the Cambrian singers; and thus the South Wales Choir is again in possession of the Challenge Prize, not to speak of an honorarium of 100*l.*, which, as the members come to London at their own expense, or at that of their patrons is thoughtfully bestowed. With arbiters so thoroughly competent as those we have named, the decision cannot be accepted as otherwise than satisfactory; and to call it in question would be scarcely etiquette. Still many have felt surprise at the apparent indifference of our London choral associations, who might, had they pleased, have taken part in the contest; and not less so at the reticence of Birmingham, Manchester, Bradford, Leeds, &c. True, the London choristers, however admirable, are for the most part seldom disposed to be over-enthusiastic; whereas the Welsh boil over with enthusiasm, and this cannot fail to make its impression on a vast crowd (on this occasion upwards of 12,000)—more especially a crowd something like a moiety of which consists of Welshmen born and bred. We can readily understand the very justifiable pride of our Celtic musical friends at carrying off the "grand prix" under the noses, it may be said, of London chorus-singers. The contest, nevertheless, was one of unusual interest; and we may congratulate the South Wales Choral Union on the supremacy they have honourably earned, a supremacy which, to the utmost of their ability, they seem resolved to maintain.

The singing of the Tonic Sol-fa contingent, under the direction of Mr. Proudman, was so much approved by the judges, that the second prize, a 50-guinea harmonium, the gift of MM. Alexandre and Co., at Paris, was spontaneously awarded to them. The contest in which the Welsh choralists remained victors was preceded by another, three choirs of men singers—Mr. Proudman's choir (Tonic Sol-fa), the Bristol Choral Union (conductor, Mr. A. Stone), and the Liverpool Representative Choir (conductor, Mr. Sanders)—competing. Without going into details we may add that, after the selected choruses had been sung, followed by a glee from the Liverpool Choralist Union, and a trial of sight-reading, the first prize of 50*l.* was awarded by Sir J. Benedict, Mr. H. Leslie, and Mr. J. Barnby to the Liverpool Choir; the second, a library of music presented by Messrs. Chappell and Co., to the Bristol choir; and a certificate of merit to that of the Tonic Sol-fa—so that in each instance poor London came off either second or third best. But the chief interest of the day was attached to the trial of skill in which the Welsh came off victorious, and which almost drove frantic their compatriots, who mustered in thousands, and cheered and cheered till they must have been exhausted with their efforts. After the South Wales Choral Union had sung, Mr. Griffith Jones said that Mr. Fothergill, M.P. for Merthyr Tydvil, was so pleased with what had been done that, whether they won or lost the prize, he intended to have a medal struck and presented to each member of the choir. A memorial silver cup was presented, in the Opera-room of the Crystal Palace, to the South Wales Choral Union by a number of compatriots, in commemoration of the triumph last year. Mr. H. Richard, M.P., who took the chair, said that the idea had originated with Mr. Brinley Richards, and the cup was, accordingly, presented to Mrs. Brinley Richards, and others patriotically interested, on behalf of the choir. The whole affair, indeed, was a sort of Welsh Festival; and it may be added that the national music meetings have already been christened by Welsh enthusiasts "The Crystal Palace Eisteddfod"—although in its general bearings, the musical competitions allowed for, the gathering has little affinity to that revered and ancient Cambrian institution.

The prizes awarded by the appointed judges to the various choral societies, solo singers, and military bands, were distributed on Saturday afternoon from the Handel orchestra, in the Central Transept, which was filled in every part. Previous to this formal ceremony there was a concert, in which all the successful competitors had something to do. By way of prelude, while the audience were taking their places, Dr. William Spark, organist of the Town Hall at Leeds, who has done so much for music in that populous and thriving city, performed a number of pieces on the great organ, all more or less interesting, but two of them remarkably so. The first of these was a "postlude" in D major, by Mr. Henry Smart, a masterly work calculated to do honour to our English school of organ music, of which Mr. Smart has long been one of the most learned and prolific representatives. The second was J. S. Bach's Pedal Fugue in D minor, about which it would be superfluous to say anything. Both were admirably played, as indeed was the rest of the programme, including various compositions from The Organist's Quarterly Journal, by Silas, Merkel, Guilmant, and Dr. Spark himself, besides a fantasia by the late Lefébure Wély, of the Paris Madeleine. The concert began with the overture to Rossini's Gazza Ladra, played by the Crystal Palace Orchestra, under the direction of its official conductor, Mr. Manns. Miss Jessie Jones, pupil of Signor Randegger, in the Royal Academy of Music, then sang Beethoven's "Ah perfido," and by her fresh voice, careful execution, and good style, fully bore out the opinion of the judges; as did, later in the programme, the prize contralto, Miss Bolingbroke, pupil of Signor Schira, whose voice is one of genuine quality, and whose delivery of "Fac ut portem," from Rossini's Stabat Mater, proved that she had not only been well taught, but knew how to profit by her teaching Mr. Frank Gifford, too, the prize tenor, who selected the scena of Max, from the first act of Der Freischütz, distinguished himself favourably, although, his voice being a low tenor, some objection might be taken to his choice. These were all accompanied by the orchestra. Mr. Thorndike, however, the prize baritone, elected to sing a ballad, "When morning comes with golden light," and was accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. J. Robinson, from Dublin. Mr Thorndike has a good voice, and sings with expression. The ladies subsequently joined in "Quis est homo," from Rossini Stabat; and, further on, the ladies and gentlemen gave Sir Michael Costa's well-known quartet, "Ecce quel fiero istante." On the whole, the solo vocalists at this "National Meeting" have certainly come out well from the ordeal. With regard to the military bands, it will suffice to say that the Soldaten Lied of Gungl was played in perfection by the Royal Artillery band (conductor, Mr. Lawson), and that the juvenile military band of the Marylebone Schools, who had won the first prize against three competitors, also composed of juveniles, elicited much amusement and as much applause by the determined manner in which they got through a long fantasia on themes from Verdi's Ernani. One of the young gentlemen, who played an ophicleide obbligato part, must be a Hughes or Phasey en herbe.

But the greatest interest of the day was centred in the performances of the choral societies, and especially in those of the Tonic Sol-fa Association and the South Wales Choral Union—which last carried away the Challenge Prize in 1872, and, as we have already recorded, have earned a right to be its legitimate possessors until a day shall arrive when they may be forced to succumb in the contest—at present not seemingly a probable event. The fire and sustained energy with which the Welsh choristers, under the vigorous guidance of "Caradoc," their chief (the women dispensing with the printed music), sang "Come with torches," from Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, was astonishing. That in this difficult piece their intonation should be here and there at fault was inevitable; but their "attack" was as sure as the stroke from a hammer delivered by a well-skilled hand, and their precision was never once at fault. This chorus (in which, by the way, the orchestra took part) being persistently encored, the familiar "March of the Men of Harlech" (sung in the Welsh language—unaccompanied) was substituted in its place; and here not only were the freshness and pungent quality of the voices shown off to eminent advantage, but the intonation was quite as unimpeachable as the precision already referred to. The Tonic Sol-fa Association, under the direction of Mr. Proudman, selected Mendelssohn's eight-part unaccompanied chorus, "Judge me, O God" (43rd Psalm), for their display; and, except by Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, we have never heard this grand inspiration more finely or more accurately rendered. It was almost perfect in its way, and, with a little numerical strengthening of the second basses and second sopranos, might have been absolutely perfect. It was listened to with delight, encored with unanimity, and repeated with increased effect. Every one was pleased to remark how, when the Tonic Sol-fa people got up to sing, the members of the South Wales Choir rose to cheer and applaud, and how the same marks of respect and brotherly feeling were shown by the members of the Tonic Sol-fa when the Welsh were about to begin. Though the Welsh obtained the Challenge Prize the Tonic Sol-fa have lost no honour; and this was evidently the conviction of both parties, to whom the contest had been equally creditable. Three other choral societies, prize-winners, took part in the programme. These were the "Liverpool Representative" (male voices), who gave a Fest-gesang by Mendelssohn, unaccompanied; the Stepney Tonic Sol-fa Society, who sang Wilbye's madrigal, "Sweet honey-sucking bees;" and the South London Choral Association, for whom was set down a chorus, from Handel's Jephtha. To Mr. Wilmore (of the Crystal Palace), who gained the trumpet prize, was allotted a solo. "God bless the Prince of Wales" (Brinley Richards), and "God save the Queen," by the united choirs, bands, great organ, and solo singers, formed an imposing climax to the musical proceedings in the Handel Orchestra.

The prizes were then distributed. After a short address to the audience delivered by Mr. T. Hughes, Chairman of the Crystal Palace Company, in which reference was made to the unavoidable absence of the Duke of Edinburgh, and a hearty compliment paid to our Welsh visitors, the ceremony began, Mrs. T. Hughes handing the money prizes to the various claimants, and pointing to those, in books, &c., the contributions of Messrs. Chappell, Boosey, Alexandre, and Besson (more especially to the Challenge Prize), which were too heavy to carry immediately away. As each claimant stepped on to the orchestra there was loud applause—loudest in particular for the lady solo prize-winners, the boys of the Marylebone Schools Band, the Tonic-Sol-fa Association, represented by Mr. Proudman, and loudest and most general for the South Wales Choral Union, represented by "Caradoc," who could manage to take with him the purse of 100 guineas, but not the Challenge Prize. Altogether Mr. Willert Beale, the originator, and Mr. G. Grove, the active promoter of this new scheme, may be congratulated on the decided success of this its first anniversary.

THE WELSH CHORISTERS AT MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

Perhaps what may have satisfied the energetic members of the South Wales Choral Union more than any other distinction gained during their short visit to London was the gracious reception accorded to them by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, on Monday afternoon, at Marlborough House. The prince had expressed a desire to hear the Welsh singers, and that desire was communicated to Mr. Brinley Richards. The appointed hour was 4 o'clock, and at half past 3, the committee of the Welsh invasion of London (for so, in a musical sense, it may be called) assembled half an hour earlier at Willis's Rooms. When arrangements had been decided on, they marched from Willis's Rooms to Marlborough House, the committee leading the way, followed by the choristers (some 500 in number), and preceded by the familiar Eisteddfod banner, with its device of a red-winged dragon, emblem of the erst Princes of Snowdon, its motto "Yn nawdd Duw ac dangnef" ("Under the protection of God and peace.") and sequel "The Red Dragon is always to the front," surmounted by the Druidical symbol of the "Gorseidd." On arriving at Marlborough House the procession was received by Canon Jenkins (of Landaff, in Professorial robes) marshalled into order by Mr. Brinley Richards, the most formidable champion of Welsh minstrelsy, and himself now the acknowledged chief of Welsh musicians. The singers took up their places on the lawn opposite the grand portal, and were formed in a semicircle. Chairs were placed for the Royal party, who, after some half hour's delay, arrived—the Prince of Wales, the Princess of Wales, the Cesarevna, the Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, &c., conspicuous in the front rank, a distinguished company being in the rear. Then, after a sign from Mr. Brinley Richards to "Caradoc" (Mr. Griffiths), conductor of the South Welsh Choral Union, the concert began with "God save the Queen." To this succeeded the beautiful old Welsh melody, "Llwyn Onn" (the "Ash Grove," as we know it in English), which, perhaps, no other choir could sing so well. Up to this moment all the singers were uncovered, but the Prince of Wales, through Mr. Richards, graciously expressed a wish that they should put on their hats, which, the sun being a little fierce, was a by no means unacceptable request. The "Ash Grove" was followed by a new and very lively part song, "Let the hills resound," the composition of Mr. Brinley Richards, excellent itself, and rendered with so much spirit that the Prince of Wales, on behalf of the whole Royal party, demanding a repetition, it was given a second time. In this piece especially the extraordinary instinct of rhythm which characterizes the Welsh choristers was exemplified. Nothing seems to disconcert them, nothing to put them out; they go on singing and singing, as if song were their natural speech; and then the ringing tone and freshness of their voices—men, women, and boys—adds indefinably to the charm. That the concluding two pieces should be the "March of the Men of Harlech" and "God bless the Prince of Wales" (Brinley Richards), which has somehow come to be looked upon as a second National Anthem, was almost a matter of course. At the end of the concert, which lasted barely half an hour, a Welsh "Hurrah" was given for the Prince of Wales; then three cheers were devoted to the Princess of Wales, and lastly three more to the Royal family. In the course of the concert the three youngest children of the Prince took seats in front, and appeared to enter heartily into the spirit of the performance. At the end his Royal Highness came forward, and after examining the memorial gold cup presented to the South Wales Choral Union at the Crystal Palace the other day by a number of their compatriots, resident in London, shook hands with Canon Jenkins and other distinguished members of the committee, expressing at the same time, on behalf of the Princess of Wales and himself, the gratification received from the singing of the choir, coupled with a hope that their visit to London had been as agreeable as their success had been merited, and wishing them a prosperous journey back again to their native country. After more cheering, courteously acknowledged by the Royal party, the musicians partook of some refreshment, and the cortége, banner in front, retired in the same orderly manner as they had come. That the Welsh singers and their honourable committee departed highly pleased with their reception was evident on every face.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.

The first opera played last week was Faust, with Mdlle. Marie Roze, vice Madame Christine Nilsson, as Margaret, and the rest of the characters as before. About the Margaret of Mdlle. Roze we spoke last year. In all that this popular favourite of the Opéra Comique essays she shows extreme intelligence, and her impersonation of M. Gounod's cherished heroine is no exception to the rule. That occasionally her powers are hardly equal to the dramatic requirements of the part is unquestionable. Nevertheless, her prepossessing appearance and her invariable earnestness confer a certain charm on her performance. She is decidedly best in the garden scene, especially in the romance, "C'era un re," and its meditative interpolations, when Margaret is thinking or dreaming of Faust; the recitative when she contemplates the jewels (the last movement of which was applauded and asked for again); and the whole of the duet with Faust, in which Mdlle. Roze, quiet as is her general deportment, both acts and sings with real feeling.

Mignon was played on Tuesday week, for the last time this year, with Madame Christine Nilsson as the heroine, and the other characters as before. Among the audience were the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Cesarewitch, and the Cesarevna. On Thursday week we had a repetition of La Favorita, and on Saturday, Le Nozze di Figaro was given for the first time (and apparently the last) this season. The only novelty in the distribution of characters in this, of recent years so familiar work at both our opera houses, was the Susanna of Mdlle. Torriani, one of the most acceptable and promising of Mr. Mapleson's new acquisitions. Mdlle. Torriani's acting was sprightly, natural, and full of intelligence. She has something yet to learn before making herself thoroughly conversant with the music. Nevertheless, she sang many things remarkably well, and none better than "Deh vieni non tardar," the expressive and melodious soliloquy of Susanna, in the garden, where the imbroglio to be explained eventually sets all matters right. Fair hopes may be entertained about the future career of Mdlle. Torriani. The other parts were filled by Mdlle. Tietjens, the most stately of Countesses; Madame Trebelli (Cherubino), whose exquisite singing of "Voi che sapête" deserved the encore it received; Signor Agnesi, whose Figaro is too well known to need description; Signor Rota, after his manner, an excellent Count Almaviva; Signor Borella, now one of the best of Bartolos; Signor Rinaldini (Basilio), &c. The orchestra, under Sir Michael Costa, was perfect throughout, and the appreciation of its merits by the audience was shown by an early encore of the overture. The performances, not to enter further into superfluous detail, were altogether satisfactory.

The operas during the week have been Semiramide (Monday); Faust—for the benefit, and last appearance this season, of Mdme. Christine Nilsson (Tuesday); the Huguenots (Thursday); and Martha (Friday). To-night, the last of the season, a performance is announced for the benefit of Mdlle. Tietjens. Balfe's Talismano, the only promised novelty, is postponed until next year.

WHY Tootmanposo DID NOT DEVOTE HIMSELF TO MUSIC.

(From "Another World.")

Had I not been the son of a king I should probably have been educated as a harpist; for even as a child I showed great disposition for the harp, and composed both words and music for my favourite instrument; but my father's chief councillor, a man of great sagacity, saw in me the germ of intellectual powers far beyond those required for the most perfect execution on the harp, and, counselled by this sage, I was led to other studies by judicious treatment, to the sceptical surprise of my early tutors.

WAGNER AND OFFENBACH.*

We have read with the most lively interest a book which our colleague, M. Gustave Chouquet, has just had published by the firm of Firmin Didot, Brothers; it is the production of a choice mind combined with a noble character.

The Histoire de la musique dramatique en France, crowned by the Institute, is a genuine monument, at once historical and literary, which will find a place allotted to it in the library of every scholar, as well as on the shelves of all who desire to be instructed. We devote a special notice to this useful and fine publication which takes musical art from its origin and conducts it progressively to our own epoch with a remarkable charm of style. We cite the opinion of M. Chouquet on two musicians, Wagner and Offenbach, each of whom, in his particular line, has helped to divert from the right road the most pleasing and most attractive of all the arts. L. E.

"M. Richard Wagner (Leipsic, 22nd May, 1813) possesses remarkable intelligence swayed by immeasurable pride. Instead of devoting himself exclusively to literature or science, he preferred coming forward as a musical innovator, and disguising the infertility of his imagination by renewing an old system, not assuredly the system of the Greeks, but that of the Florentine masters, who created modern opera. He did not depart all at once from traditional forms; nay, he sought success even by endeavouring, in Rienzi (Théâtre Lyrique, 6th April, 1869), and in The Flying Dutchman, to be melodious. But he was compelled to acknowledge that Nature had refused him the gift of happy melody, abundance of theatrical ideas, and that tenderness of heart which inspires touching thoughts.

"He now resolved to employ the whole force of his intellectual faculties in deceiving the public and founding what he modestly called the Music of the Future. A poet, composer, and critic simultaneously, he conceived the notion of lyrical dramas founded on subjects taken from the old legends of Germania; he published books to explain his dramatic theory, the rational part of which is merely the reproduction of the principles enounced by B. Marcello and by Gluck, enveloped in a veil of German fog; in a word, he composed successively Tannhäuser (Dresden, 20th October, 1845), Lohengrin, the Rheingold and Tristan und Isolde, flanked by apologetic writings entitled: Art and Revolution, Art-Works of the Future, Opera and Drama, and Communications to his Friends. It is easier learnedly to combine chords, and invent ingenious effects of instrumentation, than to endow the lyric stage with moving situations, well constructed pieces, and original motives. Deficient in dramatic action and interest, and badly adapted for the voice, the poet-musician's early operas did not at first gain the suffrages of those whose national self-love he had taken care to flatter. The astute and perfidious artist did not allow himself to be discouraged by want of success; with the obstinacy characterising the men of his race, he persevered in the new course he had traced out, having good reasons for renouncing more and more pure melody, for disdaining ordinary forms, and for replacing them by floating and indefinite melopœiæ, by flights of chords bristling with dissonances, and by a series of confused phrases, clashing with each other, without punctuation and without logic.

"He was not ignorant that, in Germany, people willingly accept obscurity as depth; that they are fond of discovering sense in what is unintelligible; that, in all countries of the world:

'Les sots depuis Adam sont en majorité.'†

"He was right in thus reckoning on the admiration of those who excel in grouping sounds, without ever succeeding in inventing a theme with aught like novelty about it.

"The consequence was that these irreconcilable foes of novelty hastened to proclaim him the first of the composers of our time. Despite their selfish praises, despite the dithyrambics of a certain number of journalists, fond of combating the dominant opinion of the day, and seeking in paradoxes and eccentric pleading an occasion to sharpen their wit; yes, despite these concerts of laudation, more or less sincere, the author of Tannhäuser is still nothing more for us than a vain individual deluding himself, as he deludes others, with a vain hope.

"The French public, who, alas! no longer feel the deep interest they once felt in questions of art, never asked themselves how it was that R. Wagner and his adepts were led to deceive themselves, and wish to deceive themselves. They did not enquire into the vices of a system which, under the pretext of causing music to progress, tends, on the contrary, to lead it back to the shapeless attempts of the end of the sixteenth century. They did not trouble themselves to remount to the source of an evil which does not interest them. It matters little to them that certain works in Beethoven's third manner are the starting point of the Wagnerian aberrations; do they even know that the most epic and the greatest of symphonists was condemned to the torture of total deafness, and that, during the last years of his life, having lost the feeling of duration, he abandoned himself without control and without restraint to the sublime flights of his thoughts? The crowd that frequent theatres do not indulge in æsthetic studies; they listen impartially to the works submitted to their judgment, and accord their favours to whatever does not require long reflection, but amuses or flatters them, and, above all, which charms, touches, captivates, and consoles, which elevates and ennobles them.

"To misty music they preferred the songs of the streets; to the learned composer, enamoured with vrillante sonority, as Berlioz said, after hearing the strident prelude of Lohengrin, to the harmonist delighting in excessive and wire-drawn niceties, they preferred the caricaturist, Jacques Offenbach (Cologne, 1819), a lyric Uhlan, pillaging here and pillaging there, and laughing at musical orthography and syntax; a clever man, however, and sometimes an amusing caricaturist, but a dangerous joker, who glories in metamorphosing the Parisian theatres into petites maisons.

"With a political regimen, under which there was no difficulty in leading astray the opinion of those who dispensed favours, operetta was enabled to declare with impunity war on opera; extravagance then replaced healthy pleasantry; vulgar burdens superseded inspired melody, the worst language passed muster as originality—and, for too many years, honours of all kinds seemed reserved for the very persons who dishonoured music.

"Had it not been for the influence, increasing day by day, of wealth, and the progress of a moral malady, which, even yesterday, threatened to gangrene the entire social body, we believe that the trivialities of the coarse traders in operettas would never have been tolerated so long. After the disasters of 1870, however, after the sorrow, the shame, and the chastisements of 1871, France was hurrying along a path which will lead to ruin if she does not at length regain her self-command, if she does not eagerly return to good sense and good taste, if she does not drive promptly and for ever, from our lyric stage, those shameless beings who seem to take a malicious pleasure in corrupting the national mind, without perceiving that they are helping to launch our unfortunate country down the slope which ends in an abyss. However sad the hour when we pen these lines, we do not despair of the future, because we recollect with gratitude that the present leaders of the French school placed themselves at the head of their art under the most unfavourable circumstances. They have remained faithful to healthy and strong traditions; they have reacted against the excesses of intolerable violence; they have resisted the spirit of system; and they have opposed a dam to the encroachments of bad taste, instead of allowing themselves to be cast down and discouraged by the spectacle of contemporary society. They have preserved the noble and firm conviction that the authority of character doubles the authority of talent, and this is why neither the disorders of the intellectual world, nor the encroachments of power, have weakened their poetic faith, their love of the Ideal, or their devotion to the cause they so brilliantly serve. "GUSTAVE CHOUQUET."

MORE ABOUT CHARACTER DIVERS.

(From "Another World.")

Where a young man evinced qualities which, when tested, showed that he would make but a second-rate artist, the Character Divers demonstrated that these youths possessed natural tendencies better fitting them for some other pursuit.

I have in my thoughts at this moment a favourite subject of the artistic pavement;—a man—Zolea by name—who, as a boy, was inattentive to his studies, while his talent for sketching from Nature* was so remarkable that, even during school hours, with his eye seemingly on his book, he would occupy himself in sketching those around him. Every one, except the Character Divers, thought that Nature intended this boy for a great artist. These demonstrated that, as an artist, he would never attain a high position; and after observing how he occupied himself in play-hours, and subjecting him to numerous tests, so completely cured him of his want of application and other defects, that he became the wisest and greatest among our kings. He aided me much in the devising and carrying out many things for the well-being of our planet.—Hermes.

* All students, even beginners, sketch from Nature, no other sketching being allowed.

SPANISH OPERA.*

By Jose Inzenga.

Very many are the projects of general interest and real value which, under present circumstances, and in consequence of impulses obeying the current feeling of the day, earnestly excite the attention of all those among our leading artists who combat beneath the civilizing banner of music. All the various branches of an art as important as extended, which have already—sometimes singly and sometimes united—contributed in their manifold manifestations so surprisingly to the moralisation of our manners, the elevation of our ideas, and the development of our material as well as our artistic interests—all these branches are not merely the constant object kept in view by the directory of our National School of Music, which nearly always takes the initiative, but, also, of the meetings periodically held at our artistico-literary centre. The creation of an Academy of Music, the definite establishment of our national opera, the amelioration of the sacred music in our churches, the improvement of our military bands, the organization of vocal unions, the foundation of musical libraries, the laws regarding literary and musical property, the organic regulations respecting the satisfactory management of our theatres, and a thousand other things, daily felt to be urgent neccssities in our native land, afford evidence of the natural progress we are making, despite the fact of our being surrounded by many political difficulties. In the said meetings the slightest details are thoroughly discussed and analysed—and that, too, not merely with the most conscientious earnestness, and the most exquisite form, but with that gentle tact which Señores Cardenas and Hernando have introduced into the proceedings. These gentlemen are worthy presidents of the Sections for Poetry and Music, and are conducting those inseparable and intimately connected sister arts towards the noble and desirable goal they have in view.

But of all the projects mooted, however desirable and truly successful they might prove to art, not one has achieved the honour of so wonderfully excited a discussion, and so instructive a battle of words, as the idea of providing a nursery for Spanish Opera. The most celebrated composers took part in the debate, and, filled with enthusiasm, as patriotic as artistic, acknowledged almost unanimously the possibility of creating a kind of music which, without in any way evading the requirements of modern drama, should yet maintain a special character, materially distinguishing Spanish Opera from the opera of Italy, France, and Germany.

This is indeed an enterprise as difficult as it is great, and which can never be approached with certainty unless it be preceded by a course of preparatory and well-defined studies, the object of which must be not only to smooth the way which leads up to the undertaking, but to form the solid foundation which shall support it. These studies would consist in the rational and careful trial of all those branches of knowledge, which by their nature are directly related to the object in view. Such are, for instance: the history of our own country, the idiom of our own country; its old theatre; its traditions and manners; its folk's-songs and folk's-dances; its national hymns and national marches—besides many other varied elements, inseparable from our mode of life and our most peculiar nationality. Great are the advantages which a composer, possessing, in addition to truly good technical knowledge, something of the divine light called genius, can derive from the careful and intelligent analysis of all these things. We do not doubt that, in virtue of his genius, he would of necessity impart to his works a genuine Spanish character, the beau ideal as well as the laudable end, which all our artists now-a-days strive to reach.

In the history of our native land, and in our old theatre, such a composer will find all the information requisite to paint with the greatest possible dignity and truth the peculiar character of any epoch as well as the special dispositions of the personages whose passions and affections he wishes to steep in music. The traditions and manners should, on the one hand, serve him as important monuments of certain definite localities, while, on the other, they will open up to his glance a most extensive horizon for zealous researches, which cannot fail to be of great use whenever he prepares faithfully to pourtray the customs of rustic life, the family circle round the domestic hearth, the elevated or simple heads of belief entertained by the people, their old traditional prejudices, and a thousand other poetical details calculated to impart great animation and power of colour to the pictures his fancy would fain create. The analytical study of the peculiar structure of the Spanish language, with its endless beauties, will, in the first place, cause him to pay proper attention to prosody, and at the same time avoid everything prejudicial to the due realisation of the musical phrase. This will enable him to identify himself with the train of feeling pursued by the librettist, whom, after all, he has to follow in the variety of affections and tones employed in the dramatic fiction, so that the two, the composer and the librettist, may—so to speak—unanimously move the intelligent audience who have to pronounce judgment on both.

And then, finally, the knowledge of all the folk's-songs and folk's-verses, both of our provinces in the Peninsula and of those beyond sea! This, and an acquaintance with the marches, the patriotic songs, and the national hymns which are so closely entwined with our famous deeds in times gone by, and constitute the pure and faithful reflex of Spanish feeling,—all these will form a rich arsenal of varied and interesting elements to which a composer will be compelled to have recourse, should he be desirous of giving his work the impress not merely of a certain epoch, but also of a definite locality.

As old and experienced musicians are aware, an earnest composer, whoever he be, can pursue no more pleasing and profitable course of study than this, because such revelations, partly simple and partly energetic, of the soul, conceal within themselves numerous elements of variety. Strange tonalities, a rich store of rhythms, and widely erratic modulations, full of a magical poetic perfume, are all combined in those beautiful melodies, which, like fragrant but bashful flowers, lie scattered about our native country, no less in the most arid hilly or mountainous regions than on the most smiling of our level plains. It is for this reason especially that, in our opinion, our folk's-songs and folk's-dances should form the principal foundation on which to raise the structure of Spanish Opera. But the reader must not conclude from this that the composer is to transfer them entire into his scores, as they are heard on the lips of the people. By no means! This would be to copy Nature painfully and exactly, which never has been the mission of art, and never will be. Rather let him thoroughly master their melodic, rhythmical, and harmonic structure, and become thoroughly imbued with their essential characteristics. Thus prepared let him express passion and tender feeling, as his heart and talent may suggest, employing for the purpose all the resources known in art.

But, at the same time, he will impart to his ideas an original and typical form, the necessary result of the studies we have enumerated. This originality of form will distinguish our music from any hitherto known. In this manner there will be created a new branch of theatrical art, which, some day, we shall be able with patriotic pride to designate by the name of Spanish Opera.*

* From La Espana Musical.

Milan.—Scarcely has Signor Brunello been once more accepted by the Municipality as their tenant for three years at the Scala—and long, probably, before he has settled in his own mind what he is going to do—ere the public has been overwhelmed with the usual conflicting reports of which operas are to be produced and which not. Among the former are mentioned Don Carlo, Aida, and Macbeth, by Verdi; I Lituani, by Ponchielli; Le Prophète, by Meyerbeer; and Romio et Juliette, by Gounod. En fait de ballet, Signor Borri's Figlinol Prodigo occupies a prominent position.—Signora Galletti bade adieu to the Teatro Dal Verme in two last performances. She is so popular that she could not accommodate all her admirers at one such solemnity, and, therefore, favoured them with two. Her programme comprised two acts of Olema; the fourth act of La Favorita; the ballet of Brahma; the prologue of Rigoletto; and the overture to Signor Ponchielli's Promessi Sposi.—At the same theatre, Signor Aldighieri has made a big hit as Figaro in Il Barbiere.

* As it is a long time, unfortunately, since we received a copy of our esteemed contemporary, the España Musical, this translation is made from a German version of the original, published in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, the writer in which appends the annexed note: "Though the above article as a whole is not treated from a high artistic point of view—as, to adduce an argument in support of our assertion, music less than aught else should be restricted by the wretched shackles of narrow-minded patriotism—it is still well worthy attention."

CHRISTINE NILSSON'S BENEFIT.

(From the "Daily Telegraph." July 16th.)

Madame Christine Nilsson bade farewell to her English friends last night as the Marguerite of Faust, and her English friends packed "Old Drury" from floor to roof in their eagerness to show the constancy and depth of their admiration. Only on rare occasions has such a crowd filled the theatre—a crowd as diverse in composition as it was great in numbers. Boxes and stalls presented a brilliant array of those who are in a special sense the supporters of opera; but the "people" were there also—almost literally "in their thousands"—occupying every "coign of vantage," and defying heat and discomfort with a resolution which did the highest honour to its cause. Mdme. Nilsson may have had no chance this season of achieving fresh triumphs in connection with new characters, and, undoubtedly, the fact is to be regretted; but last night's experience showed that she has lost none of her hold upon that faithful English public which, if it declines sacrificing sobriety and dignity to admiration, never deserts those whom it has once taken into favour. We do not escort prime donne to their homes by torchlight, with royal princes acting as an immediate guard of honour, nor do we disturb the sleep of the Queen's lieges by midnight serenades; but our demonstrations, though less imposing, are not less sincere, and the artist who knows our ways, as Mdme. Nilsson knows them, runs no risk of undervaluing the honours she receives. The Swedish lady's "benefit," therefore, was a great and striking success, the attitude of the public towards her being one of intense sympathy and admiration. A better opera than Faust could hardly have served for an event so interesting. To begin with, it has an attraction of its own. The most popular lyric drama of modern times, Gounod's work is one of the very few which, to a certain extent, are independent of performers. Faust never lacks an audience, for there is always charm enough in the story and in the music to "draw." But—and this is even more to the purpose—Marguerite ranks among Mdme. Nilsson's best characters, if, indeed, it be not the one in which the public best love to see her. Every part she plays has its special attraction. We admire the graçefulness of Violetta, the force of Lucia, the half ethereal beauty of Ophelia, and the pathos of Mignon; but to think of her is to think of Marguerite more readily than of anything else. The German maiden's story of love and death appeals to all sympathies; and, as Mdme. Nilsson's genius enables her to embody the ideal of the character, it is no wonder that the performer and the part are thus instinctively associated. We have nothing new to say of the Marguerite which was again presented on the Drury Lane stage last night; its merits are household words, and its praises have long been a favourite theme. Enough that Mdme. Nilsson responded to the fervour of her reception by a performance rare, even for her, in the completeness of its art. The garden, the death scene of Valentine, the church, the prison, each exhibited a phase of the gifted lady's conception of the character, and each phase seemed most perfect till the next was shown. How the audience testified their approval may easily be imagined, though scarcely, perhaps, could fancy exaggerate the demonstration which followed the third act. A steady and continuous roar of applause, amid which the clapping of hands was but faintly distinguished, called the bénéficiaire forward again and again, while bouquets rained upon the stage in such profusion that even Mephistopheles, smiling benignantly the while, had to carry them off in armsful. As then, so after the fourth act, and after the curtain fell for the last time—in brief, the audience did all that audience could do to prove the strength of their admiration, and the heartiness of their "farewell." Uppermost in every mind, we will venture to say, was the wish that Madame Nilsson might soon return to enjoy better opportunities of proving the comprehensiveness of her talent than those afforded by the now expiring season. The prima donna was supported by Mdlle Bauermeister, Mdlle. Macvitz, Signor Campanini, Signor Del Puente, and Signor Rota, each of whom contributed to the merit of a representation above the average in point of excellence.

---

BRESLAU.—The fact of Mdme. Mallinger's inability to fulfil her engagement here having given rise to many misrepresentations, Herr Schwemer has addressed the following short note to the press: "Several papers have published notices with reference to the engagement of Mdme. Mallinger, at the theatre here, which are totally untrue, and insulting to her honour. From the profoundest conviction I am bound to state that Mdme. Mallinger was ill when she arrived, and, for that reason, unable to appear during the time at her command."

BARCELONA.—A Sociedad Wagner has been formed here for the exclusive performance of works by the Composer of the Future.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The five performances which were given last week consisted of Il Trovatore, Le Nozze di Figaro (twice), Faust e Margherita, and Les Diamans de la Couronne. We may state at once, and without reserve, that the Diamans de la Couronne, which again brought together a crowded audience, is likely to be a permanent feature in the repertory. Its story, so familiar to English amateurs, and its music, more familiar still, afford to this most charming of comic operas the inestimable advantage of being understood without the aid of preliminary explanation. The curtailments already made by Signor Vianesi, who so ably directs the performance, are all to the good—so much so that he will doubtless be encouraged to make still others. An opera containing a new part, in which Mdme. Adelina Patti is allowed the opportunity to shine at her very best, deserves the utmost care. Such an opera is Les Diamans, and such a part is that of Caterina. Mdme. Sinico now replaces Mdme. Monbelli in the character of Diana; and it must be allowed that the change is by no means for the worse. The cast might be otherwise strengthened, but opportunities will no doubt arise for the further discussion of this question.

Le Nozze di Figaro, produced later in the season than amateurs of Mozart's music, who flock to Covent Garden when any of Mozart's operas are given, could have wished, was interesting not only on its own account, but because two or three of the chief characters were assigned to new representatives, as, for instance, the Countess to Mdlle. Albani, the Count to M. Maurel, and Cherubino to Mdlle. Smeroschi. With M. Faure in the theatre, the part of Figaro, as on other occasions, imperatively devolved upon him, and yet many were disappointed because M. Faure was not put down for Count Almaviva, equally suited to his means. Happily, as M. Faure could not play both characters, there was M. Maurel at Mr. Gye's disposal, and his impersonation of the Count was in almost all respects as good, both dramatically and vocally, as could possibly be desired. Among other things, he sang the duet, "Crudel perchè," with Madame Sinico, one of the best of Susannas, admirably, and was no less happy in the fine soliloquy, "Hai già vinto la causa," which to sing well is to be a singer. Mdlle. Smeroschi is a Cherubino full of life and vivacity. Her fault—that of being occasionally somewhat over-demonstrative—is on the right side, because it shows earnestness, and may with careful study be easily toned down. She gives both her airs—"Non si più cosa son" and "Voi che sapête"—with abundant feeling, and no wonder that the latter obtains an encore. We should prefer the melody to flow on with less impediment, even at the loss of some too long drawn out expression. On the whole, however, the Cherubino of Mdlle. Smeroschi has so much to recommend it that to seek for more faults would be hypercritical. The Countess of Mdlle. Albani is charming. She imparts a little more life to the character than, perhaps, convention sanctions, but she gives an agreeable and natural pourtrayal all the same. Both her airs are sung with the utmost feeling—the first, "Porgi, amor," it may be said, a little too slowly, but the last, "Dove sono," as the composer himself might have wished to hear it. We hope for frequent occasions of listening to Mdlle. Albani's young and touching voice in the eloquent music of Mozart. The opera is generally well performed under Signor Bevignani's direction, and the overture, as well as other pieces, receives the accustomed tribute of an "encore."

During the present week (last but one of the season) the following operas have been performed—Don Giovanni (Monday); Les Diamans (Tuesday); Der Freischütz—first time, with Mdlle. D'Angeri as Agata, and M. Faure as Caspar (Wednesday); Rigoletto (Thursday); L'Etoile du Nord—first time, with Madame Patti and M. Faure (Friday). Der Freischütz is again announced for to-night.

STOCKHOLM.—The management of the Theatre Royal has offered a prize of 5000 thalers for the best opera, to be in at least three acts, sent in by the end of 1875. The subject of the libretto is to be taken from the history of the North.

MUNICH.—According to report, Herr Holstein's opera; Der Erbe von Morley, is to be produced next winter at the Royal Operahouse. It will be produced also, at the same time, in Weimar, Coburg, and Brunswick.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From a Correspondent.)

M. Gounod's new opera, Jeanne d'Arc, is already in active preparation at the Gaîté, for which theatre it has been secured by the manager, M. Offenbach. Most of the score has already been delivered. The few privileged persons who have had a look into it declare it worthy of the composer of Faust and Roméo et Juliette. The "Funeral March," the "Prayer" in the third act, the "Chorus of Knights," the "Chorus of Peasants fleeing from the Invader," and the "Chorus of Soldiers and Life-Guards," are said to be particularly good. The scenery has been entrusted to the well-known Parisian scene-painters, MM. Cambon, Cheret, and Fromont. The last-named artist will paint the scenery of the first three acts: the Hut of Jeanne d'Arc, the Palace of Chinon, and the Ramparts of Orleans. M. Cambon is charged to prepare the scenery of the fourth act. It is worthy of remark, as a strange coincidence, that, while this gentleman has to paint the portal of the Cathedral of Rheims for M. Gounod's Jeanne d'Arc, he has to paint the interior of the sacred edifice for the Jeanne d'Arc of M. Mermet, which is to be produced at the Grand Opera simultaneously with M. Gounod's at the Gaîté. To M. Cheret, lastly, are assigned the two scenes of the fifth act, the Prison and the Old Market-Place, Rouen. The Coronation Procession in the fourth act, and the scene of the Stake in the last, will, according to M. Offenbach's suggestions, be equal to anything ever witnessed on the stage. With respect to the costumes, also, the new manager has set to work very zealously. They are taken from contemporaneous authorities in the National Library. The same is true of the costumes at the other house, and a regular pitched battle is going on between the two Jeannes; between Gounod and Mermet, Offenbach and Halanzier, the Gaîté and the Grand Opera.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

July 16, 1873.

What have I to record this week? Well, the season has really begun; and you must not be astonished when I record the production of one grand opera, Lucie; three opera comiques, Les Dragons de Villars, Le Songe d'une nuit d'été, and Le Voyage en Chine; and four one-act "vaudevilles." Besides the above, I must not forget one extra night, exclusively devoted to M. Lesueur and his troupe, or the numerous concerts, in and out of doors, at the Etablissement; and, lastly, some clever conjuring tricks by M. Nicolay at the same place. Such is my synopsis. Now for my analysis!

Lucie de Lammermoor went off pretty well, but was trying to our young prima donna, Mdlle. Telmar. Les Dragons de Villars was certainly a success; Mdlle. Noaille appearing for the first time this season. She has a soprano voice of good compass; but though she is of prepossessing appearance, the use of her muscles, facial and larangeal, would add more expression to her acting and singing. The instrumentation in this opera is especially good; that of the second act is beautiful. It is to be regretted that the composer (Maillart) died so young (aged thirty-six) in Paris during the siege, and that he composed only two other operas—viz., Castille de Belzar and Lara. Both Le Songe d'une nuit d'été and Le Voyage en Chine went well. Of the extra night I will not say much. The house was crammed—the audience pleased. The Schneider was not the Schneider, and M. Lesueur reminded one much of a copy of Brasseur. He played the rôle of Poirier, in the comedy of Le Gendre de M. Poirier; and that of Amédée was also taken by him in Le chapeau d'un horloger. Of the vaudevilles I need say nothing.

At the Etablissement the concerts are now given daily from four to five p.m. A pretty fantasia on L'Ombre, by M. Champenois, was played on Sunday. The conjuring tricks were, of course, very "léger de main," and amused much.

Prospectively: Trovatore, avec le concours de M. Novelli, fort tenor. N.B.—This is the "star" referred to in your last impression.

Mdlle. Telmar, prima donna, leaves us at the end of this week.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From the "Liverpool Courier.")

Liverpool has at last made a commencement towards removing the reproach that she is so much given to money-making and commerce that she can find no time to cultivate the fine arts. All lovers of music in the town, and indeed all who care for the artistic dignity of the place, have been rejoiced at the double victory achieved last week at the Crystal Palace, first by the excellent choir of St. Nicholas's parish church, and then by the Representative Choir. But the question arises, shall no further effort be made to foster and increase the latent musical ability which the town undoubtedly possesses? Birmingham, Worcester, and other towns have their great musical festivals; small places like Bury, and some of the other manufacturing towns of East Lancashire and Yorkshire, have their band and choral competitions; while in Liverpool there is nothing of the sort. In former years there were musical festivals held in the town, but they fell into disuetude, the taste for music decayed, and from then till now the degeneracy has been notorious and humiliating. Now there is a chance for retrieving the lost honours. The Representative Choir numbers eighty voices, and why should it not form the nucleus of a great society—of, say, five hundred choralists—besides instrumentalists? There are in the town large numbers of vocalists of no mean merit; the Philharmonic, Musical, and other societies muster each over a hundred really practical members; while in the choirs of the churches and chapels there are singers who, in natural gifts, would compare favourably with those of any town in the kingdom. What is to hinder all these combining together, and re-establishing the periodical festivals in Liverpool? If the committee of the Representative Choir would take the matter in hand, and consult with some gentlemen, who, like Mr. Willert Beale, has had great experience in forming large societies, they might organize a series of competitive gatherings for the Northern Counties second to none in the country, and hold them every year either in Liverpool, or alternately in Liverpool and some other town of importance, on the principle of the Eisteddfodau. It may be objected that the expenses of such an undertaking would be too great, but we are inclined to think that if the project were once set on foot subscriptions would pour in, and in addition there would be the proceeds from open rehearsals, concerts, &c., which would form the principal source of revenue, and in time render the movement self-supporting. The advantages of such a scheme are great. In the first place, there would be a stimulus to cultivate musical ability, and the standard of taste would also be elevated, as nothing but first-class music would be performed. Then as the love for music increases it will permeate all classes from the highest to the lowest, and tend to the refinement of manners and morals. If the working men could be got to take an intelligent interest in music, they would doubtless be weaned from the degrading attractions of the public-houses, to the lessening of crime and ignorance. That it would have this effect we have only to look at Wales to discover. There, a love of music has always been fostered, with what result last week's performance at the Crystal Palace shows, and the Principality is noted for being comparatively free from crime and pauperism. Then, again, in France and Germany there are the Orpheons and the Lieder-Tafeln, which promote the cultivation of music in those countries, where the general sobriety and good conduct of the working classes are so well known. With such examples and inducements, it is sincerely to be hoped that Liverpool will take up the subject in a practical spirit, and organize a choir which shall be a credit to the town and a source of delight to the people.

CHRISTINE NILSSON.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Amongst the numerous handsome bouquets and wreaths which were showered on Mdme. Nilsson on the occasion of her farewell performance for this season, at Her Majesty's Opera, when she appeared as Marguerite in Gounod's Faust, perhaps the most remarkable of all was an extremely large and beautiful one presented by the Renters of Drury Lane Theatre and their nominees present at the performance, to the white satin streamers of which was fastened a complimentary card bearing the following inscription:—

"TO MADAME NILSSON,

"From the Renters of Her Majesty's Opera, present this evening, in recognition of the many delightful hours which her performances have afforded them during the season of 1873.

"16th July, 1873."

Accustomed as Mdme. Nilsson must be to applause, she must, nevertheless, have been extremely gratified with her reception on Tuesday last. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Morton S. Jackson.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1873.

TAKING up a recent number of Dwight's Journal of Music—a journal, by the way, which every musician should read—we find, on the same page, an account of two concerts given for the same object. The scene of the first concert is Leipsic, of the second, Boston; the object, an "Honour Fund" intended to cheer the declining years of Robert Franz, who unhappily needs to be cheered under the pressure of affliction and necessity. The man on whose behalf public sympathy is enlisted in both worlds should be well-known everywhere; but, we are ashamed to say, little is known of Robert Franz in England. Our amateurs may have a vague notion that he is an adept at writing additional accompaniments to Handel's music; but as a song-composer they know him scarcely at all. His name rarely, if ever, appears in English programmes; nor will either foreign or native professionals bring his works before the public. We do not intend, here and now, to protest against this. We shall not scold the amateurs, neither shall we rate the professionals, but simply beg their attention to the concerts in question, with an added entreaty that they will ask whether a musician of whom others think so much ought not to be better known by them.

The Leipsic concert took place in May at the Gewandhaus, and among those who tendered their services were Herr Joseph Joachim, Mdme. Joachim, and Herr Reinecke, who thought it not beneath his dignity to play all the accompaniments. With one or two exceptions the entire programme was made up of the vocal pieces upon which the future renown of Franz will chiefly rest. Thus the scheme embraced four songs for soprano, three for contralto, three for tenor, and four for baritone, besides a Kyrie for mixed voices, three part-songs for the same, and four for male voices only. It somewhat comforts us to read in Dwight:—

"The hall, we understand, was crowded, and the utmost enthusiasm manifested to the end of the exceptionally long performance. Such a thing could not have occurred in Leipsic, if in any German city, even a year or two ago. But now his countrymen have finally awakened to the fact that they possess a true creative genius of the purest order in Robert Franz. Now that he is growing old and sick and deaf, his songs are beginning to be heard in all the concert-rooms—though here in Boston we have had them for these twenty years!"

If Franz's æsthetic countrymen have neglected him till very lately, our own ignorance assumes a less heinous aspect. Moreover, we have such consolation, in our abasement before the keener perceptive faculties of the Bostonians, as springs from companionship.

The Boston concert seems to have been equally successful and equally good. Of it we will allow Dwight, in the person of its accomplished chief editor, to speak with the voice of authority:—

"The friends here of the great song composer,—and such are all those who love his songs,—grateful for the exquisite enjoyment and the real soul's good which they have found in those songs for years, and sympathizing deeply with the man himself, of whose necessities and physical infirmities we have for some time heard so sad a story, were present in full numbers at Mechanics' Hall, on Saturday evening, the last of May. Nearly 300 tickets at five dollars had been privately disposed of, and indeed taken up with zeal; and the net result was the addition of over $1200 to the fund (the 'Honour Fund,' the Germans call it), which is to make the long-neglected man of genius and pure devotee of Art comfortable for the remainder of his life, so far as that may be to one robbed of the power of listening to his own or any music, and, what is even worse, compelled (let us hope only for the present) to suspend his noble labours. But, besides the concert, at least two thousand dollars more have been subscribed here in large sums by half a dozen individuals; so that Boston's contribution forms a goodly part of the whole fund to be raised. Nor were the friends of Franz unmindful of the fellow-citizen and artist to whom Boston chiefly owes this honour. They came together also grateful to Mr. Otto Dresel, who first gave the impulse to the Franz cultus here now more than twenty years ago, and through whose wise and quickening influence these songs have been published in this town by hundreds, and sung in parlours and in concert-rooms with increasing frequency and interest; so that it is matter of history that here in little Boston Franz has been a household name for many years before this tardy recognition, now so hearty and complete, in his own Germany, not without echoes, too, from England, France, and even Italy. Mr. Dresel has always been the trusted friend and, through his teaching and his rare tact in playing the accompaniments, the best interpreter of Franz. Through him a very substantial benefit concert—the first, probably, which Franz ever received—was given here six years ago. That was a memorable occasion; and now again, through his zeal and exhaustive labour, has this last and still more memorable tribute been arranged and carried through successfully in every point of view."

Having laid all this before the public, our present task is accomplished, and we leave them to do the rest—to determine, for example, that Robert Franz shall no longer be merely a vaguely musical name, and that his Lieder shall have the attention, possibly the admiration, which they obviously command elsewhere. In the crush and hurry of modern life, ever crushing and hurrying more and more, excellence often loses its reward. Let us take worthy Captain Cuttle's advice, as regards the case before us, and "make a note of it." Something may thus be done to afford that greatest solace which a man of genius can enjoy when quitting life—the knowledge that he has neither laboured in vain, nor spent his strength for nought.

MUSIC.

(From "Another World.")

The power of music, beyond that derived from its mere execution, is greatly influenced by the amount of electricity infused into the sounds by the performer. In our planet the human voice, and certain musical instruments have often been known to soothe, and sometimes to restore, a disordered brain, by awakening the powers of some dormant division, when the electricity accompanying the sounds is sympathetic with the light in the brain of the listener. The human voice, other things being equal, is more electrical than sounds from musical instruments; for in the one case the emanations of light come direct from the living singer, whilst in the latter instance the electricity proceeding from the executant passes by contact with the instrument, and is thus transmitted through an intermediate conductor. The beauty and effect of many of our musical instruments, and particularly of the harp, are materially increased by the application of electricity. The hands of some persons have great power to transmit light. A skilful executant on our harp can assuage the passions of a multitude,—nay, he can excite many of the aspirations and sensibilities ascribed in your legends to Orpheus and other mythical personages. Hermes.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE following interesting account of to what purpose the tesselated pavements are used in the Star City of Montalluyah occurs in one of the most interesting chapters of Another World;—

"We delight to enrich our houses and public places with subjects which daily inspire great and pleasurable thoughts. The subjects of the tesselated pavements include wise kings, inventors, and discoverers, character-divers, preceptors, physicians, great electricians and chemists; astronomers, men skilfully learned in the power of the sun; men versed in the knowledge of the human mind; eminent painters, sculptors, and architects; men skilled in the properties of birds, beasts, fish, and other living things. Moral qualities are greatly estimated; and we have many portraits of women famous for their virtues, gentleness, and superiority; even of servants distinguished for remarkable cleanliness and other qualities. Every house has its tesselated pavement, more or less elaborate, but always beautifully executed. All our artists are great and occupy high positions."

Here is something for the intellectual inhabitants of our own globe to ponder.

AMATEUR choral societies that care anything about real efficiency—there may possibly be a few—might do worse than study the manners and customs of the miners, colliers, and labourers, who, under the name of the South Wales Choral Union, have obtained the chief prize at the Crystal Palace competition. Music is their play; but they are so far from making it a plaything that they consider rehearsals of more consequence than performance. They obey their conductor with military subordination; nor does everybody, when everybody ought to be singing piano, seize the opportunity of singing out so as to gain personal attention. With these unusual merits, it would be strange if the result was not exceptionally good. But, unhappily, the amusements of the Welsh workman suggest comparisons with more important classes than with amateur choral societies. It might not be possible, within a few centuries, to make the ordinary English labourer an intelligent and skilful performer of Handel and Mendelssohn, but we should hope it is not quite impossible to move his soul with something a little more musical than beer. It is not enough remembered how profoundly dismal the life of an English labourer is under the best conditions—it is literally all work and no play. Whether the dulness is the result or the cause of this may be an open question. But it ought not to be hard to bring out what there is in him. A musical competition between neighbouring English parishes would certainly, as things are, be something painfully comic; but the experiment would be worth making if it could be perseveringly carried out for a few years, as a supplement to the cricket match. The inevitable benefits of the mere attempt are so obvious that our neglect of such an enemy to beer and dulness is not a little astonishing. Surely not even the Saxon peasant can be quite such a boor as, for want of a helping hand, we force him to appear.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MISS CLINTON FYNES, so long and favourably known as an executant of classical music, gave a concert on Thursday, July 3rd, which was successful in attracting a large audience. The programme was an excellent one. Miss Fynes played Beethoven's Sonata Pathetique and, with M. Cros St. Ange, Mendelssohn's Sonata (Op. 45), for violoncello and piano, finishing the concert with some brilliant solos. In all of these she sustained her well-earned reputation, receiving deserved applause from all present for her performances. M. Cros St. Ange, a violoncellist of talent, performed two solos by Dunkler. Miss Edith Wynne, in the Welsh melodies of "The Ash Grove" and "Bells of Aberdovy," as usual, gained the sympathies of all present, and was loudly encored. Miss Kate Thomson, who possesses a capital voice, made her début as a vocalist on this occasion, and sang "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls" and an air by Giordani to the satisfaction of her friends present. Mr. Kerr Gedge was in excellent voice, and gave Mr. Henry Smart's elegant song "Paquita" most effectively, as did Mr. Lewis Thomas Mozart's "Qui sdegno." Both were deservedly encored. Mr. William Ganz presided at the pianoforte with his usual ability.

UNDER the patronage of the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marchionesses of Bath, Downshire, Townshend, &c., Mdlle. Therese Castellan gave a morning concert at 29, Queen's Gate Terrace (by permission of Mrs. W. Tayler), when the bénéficiaire afforded substantial proofs of her skill as a violinist. The fantasia Linda di Chamouni was given with genuine artistic ability. The principal attraction of the concert was, however, the duo on Moise, brilliantly executed by Mdlle. Castellan and Mr. John Thomas. A bolero, by the Chevalier de Kontski and Mdlle. Castellan, was given with so much taste that an encore was called for; the compliment was, however, declined. M. Jules Lefort caused much amusement in his Rat de ville, Mdlle. M. Dumas, Mdlle. Paredes, Madame Gurieff, and Mdlle. Girardi adding to the successes of the concert.

THE morning concert given last Saturday by Herr Van Biene, the violoncellist, was an undoubted success. The Duo in D of Mendelssohn, by Miss Zimmerman and Herr Van Biene, was exceedingly effective and met with deserved applause. M. Stiehle maintained the credit due to him as a violinist. The other performers were Miss Elton, the Chevalier de Kontski, Herr Werrenrath, Mr. John Thomas, and M. Gounod.

MR. SUCHET CHAMPION'S evening concert took place last Friday week at the Beethoven Rooms in Harley Street. The artists, besides Mr. and Mdme. Suchet Champion, were Mdme. Sauerbrey, Miss Beryl, Signor Caravoglia, Mr. H. C. Sanders, Miss Emma Barnett, and Mr. John Francis Barnett (piano), Mr. Oberthür (harp), and Mr. Pettit (violoncello). Conductors, Mr. Edwin Lott, Mr. Drew, and Mr. Filby. Mendelssohn's and Moscheles' piano duet on Preciosa, one of the features of the concert, was capitally played by Mr. J. F. Barnett and his youthful sister. Mr. J. Barnett's performance of his own piano solos, "Sunrise," "Sunset," and "Chanson d'Amour," were greatly admired. Mdme. S. Champion was highly successful in "Angels ever bright and fair," and in the aria, "Va dit elle." Mdme. Sauerbrey was much admired in "O mio Fernando" (La Favorita), and Signor Pinsuti's song, "I love my love." Signor Caravoglia was deservedly recalled after "Dormi pur" (Scuderi). Mr. Sanders had success in "The Yeoman's Wedding," and in an effective song, "Gethsemane," by Mr. S. Champion (violoncello obbligato by Mr. Pettit). Mr. Champion sang with taste and expression "Salve dimora" (Faust), and Miss Beryl was warmly applauded in a song by Miss V. Gabriel. Mr. Oberthür being encored in his harp solo, "Meditation," substituted his always effective "Cascade." He also played his "Clouds and Sunshine" with equal success. Mr. E. Lott, who had the lion's share in conducting, accomplished his task with great efficiency. We must not omit to state that Miss Barnett proved herself, in Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso," an accomplished pianist.

REVIEWS.

ASHDOWN & PARRY.

Deux Intermèdes de Concert. Pour piano. No. 1, in G minor; No. 2, in E major. Par STEPHEN HELLER (Op. 135).

ADMIRERS of Herr Heller's music for the piano—their name is legion—will be glad to secure these interesting pieces, which illustrate the composer's best manner, and are thoroughly attractive. No. 1 begins with a well-marked theme, Allegro non troppo, succeeded by an episode in the tonic major, in capital contrast. The development of these subjects shows much grace, and can hardly fail to be effective, even in amateur hands, for which, indeed, the entire work is suited. As an "all round" exercise for teaching purposes, we cannot too highly commend the "G minor." No. 2, in E major, is more elaborate than its companion. Beginning with a moto continuo, allegro, molto vivace, it passes to an andante quasi allegretto in A flat major, having an attractive theme accompanied in arpeggio. This portion of the work would redeem the whole, even if the rest were less excellent than it is. A resumption, in an amplified form, of the first movement, brings the piece to an effective end. We have no hesitation in recommending amateurs of capacity to procure these latest examples of Herr Heller's talent.

DUNCAN DAVISON & CO.

Love at Sea. Song. Words by HENRY F. CHORLEY. Music by Sir JULIUS BENEDICT.

BOTH the words and the music of this piece do their share towards making up a very pretty song, admirably adapted for amateur vocalists. The melody is easy, and the accompaniment such as the singer can play without having his attention distracted by difficulties. Sopranos and tenors will thank Sir Julius for having laid them under an additional obligation to his graceful musicianship.

GENOA.—Signor Rossi, of Parma, has been appointed conductor at the Teatro Carlo Felice, in place of the late Signor Mariani.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—A matinée was given on the 3rd inst., in the large room of the Shelbourne Hotel, by Miss Heilbron, from London, assisted by Miss Emilie Glover, the accomplished harpist of this city; Mrs. Stephen Murphy, vocalist; Herr Barthmann, violinist; and Herr Elsner, violoncellist. Miss Heilbron played in conjunction with Herren Barthmann and Elsner a trio in G minor by Haydn, and with Herr Barthmann, a sonata by Dussek. Her solo displays were Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, Dussek's "L'Adieu," and Mendelssohn's fantasia in C sharp minor. The young pianist was appreciated in all she did. Miss Emilie Glover played her own arrangement of motives from La Traviata, and, as usual, delighted everyone by her artistic performance, as did Herr Elsner in Servais' "Airs Russe." Herr Barthmann played a charming piece for the violin, entitled "Souvenir de Schwalbach," by Oberthür, in capital style, and the audience could not fail to be satisfied with the programme provided for them by Miss Heilbron.

Shaber Silber across the Hungarian Band.

The band of Hungarian musicians, first introduced to the London public at the Floral Hall concerts, and now appearing from time to time at all sorts of public and private entertainments, are rather disappointing. The players, in their lively-like uniforms, have not the picturesqueness of the regular gipsy troupes; and their performance, without being strikingly original, is of an inferior order in a purely musical point of view. A great number of violins, insufficiently relieved by one or more instruments of the clarionet species, and by a sort of horizontal harp, played upon with little leather-covered wooden hammers (the "gazla" of the Roumanians?), compose the orchestra. The repertory consists of Viennese dance music (waltzes, for instance, by Strauss and Gung'l) and Hungarian national melodies. The dance music is played with much spirit and slightly exaggerated accent; and we must assume that the national melodies are executed with the character properly belonging to them. We prefer, however, the artistic arrangement of the airs by Brahms and Joachim to the airs in their rough native shape, as presented by the newly arrived Hungarian band, which seems to have lost naiveté without acquiring cultivation. Its execution of the famous Rakoszcy March, at a recent Floral Hall concert, was tumultuous rather than enthusiastic. Perhaps, however, this was appropriate as recalling the legendary origin of the strange rambling tune to which each Hungarian comitat is said to have contributed its own distinguishing group of notes or war cry; the reunion of the whole into one rather wild melody being regarded as typical of the Hungarian State, consisting of various diverse counties, which combined form one organic whole. The Rakoszcy March, then—so called from the plain of Rakos, in which the representatives of the Hungarian nation were wont to assemble—is at once a mystery, a tradition, and a symbol. That, however, is no reason why it should be played in the scrambling style which marks the execution of the imported Hungarian musicians, who, by the way, use no notes, and are probably unable to read music. Their habit of playing entirely by ear favours, of course, the introduction of peculiarities which in their origin are only errors, but which in process of time come to be looked upon as characteristic beauties. The bands at watering places and most places of amusement in Hungary are composed of gipsies—there are unmistakable gipsies in the band which has been performing at the Floral Hall Concerts; and Liszt in his fantastic work on "The Gipsies and their Music in Hungary" imagines the existence of original melodies and an original scale of gipsy invention. The gipsies, however, are believed by less impulsive but sounder and better informed critics to have invented nothing. They repeat what they hear with inflections and variations, which they cannot well avoid and which are due partly to defects of memory and partly, no doubt, to peculiarities of temperament. It cannot be said of tunes, as of scandalous stories, that they lose nothing by repetition. But if they lose they also gain. Thus while they get deprived of their normal character, they acquire a new character from the voices or instruments of the untaught musicians who adopt them and make them their own. The so-called "music of the gipsies in Hungary" is not gipsy music at all. It is Hungarian music Bohemianized. How Hungarian music itself came into existence is another and more difficult question. It does exist, however; and it was interesting to hear such specimens of it as have been recently performed by the Hungarian band at the Floral Hall. A band more Hungarian (more Bohemian above all) and less nice would another season have far greater chances of success. The musicians should wear Hungarian costumes with gipsy modifications, and the band should be attended by an old woman, horrible yet picturesque to behold—a sort of Azucena of private life—whose well-understood duty it would be to collect contributions from the public. Many persons would find it more interesting to see such a band rehearsing or preparing its music than to hear the finished performances. The conductor, who is at the same time leader of the orchestra, plays on the violin the air or entire piece which he desires his musicians to perform. They, with more or less uncertain gait, follow him note by note. Occasionally he calls one of them to order with a tap from his violin bow, and he has frequently to repeat passage after passage before he can get the whole of them well together through the work under study. It might be thought that the harmony would puzzle them; but that is precisely what gives them the least trouble, the accompaniments, of the simplest character, consisting invariably of the same conventional cut-and-dried chords. Far more attractive than an instrumental band of Hungarians would be a vocal band of Russian gipsies. The human voice, whether or not the most perfect, is at least the most sympathetic, of musical instruments; and some of the Russian gipsies have voices infinitely finer than any Hungarian violin, except, of course, the one played on by Herr Joachim. About this music there is no mystery. No Liszt need write a book on "The Gipsies and their Music in Russia," it being well known that their music consists of Russian national melodies and melodies of a supposed gipsy character ("alla Gitana") written for them by Russian composers. Unfortunately it has hitherto been found practically impossible to get the Russian gipsies to leave their native land. They refuse, it is said, to go abroad unless paid in advance; while, paid in advance, with the money safe in their pockets, they do not see the utility of going abroad at all. From this dilemma there appears to be no escape; which would seem to prove that the vocal bands of Russia are less advanced in civilization than the instrumental bands of Hungary. The Hungarian band of the Floral Hall is, in fact, as we said before, a trifle too civilized; and, in particular, too formal and precise in the matter of costume. These performers of outlandish popular music should look what they are—and look it as much as possible—or their appearance loses all interest.

MISS EDITH WYNNE'S CONCERT.

One of the most successful benefit concerts of the season was that given in St. George's Hall by Miss Edith Wynne, whose musical ability and important services to art obtained, on the occasion, an acknowledgment justly their due. The entertainment began with a miscellaneous selection to which Miss Wynne's compatriots largely contributed. Miss Mary Davies, Misses M. and M. J. Williams, Mr. John Thomas, Mr. Brinley Richards, and "Eos Morlais," a tenor of great repute in Wales, gave their best services; while the sympathy of English artists for the bénéficiaire was represented by Madame Patey, Madame Pauline Rita, Miss Bessie Waugh, Mr. Arthur Mathison, and Mr. Radcliffe. When all do well it seems invidious to particularise, but special mention should be made of a duet for pianoforte and flute on airs from Semiramide, played by Miss Waugh and Mr. Radcliffe. Both artists were equal to their task, and the result was, in point of success, all they could desire. After the selection came a performance of Signor Randegger's pretty two-act operetta, The Rival Beauties, which introduced Miss Wynne as Alice Lynn, supported by Miss Angele (Lady Edith), Mr. Cummings (Sir Percy), Mr. Patey (Stephen Lynn), and Mr. Lewis Thomas (Tom Deloraine). The Rival Beauties, either in its entirety or in fragments, is well known to amateurs of that kind of music which satisfies the double requirements of popularity and excellence; and this fact, joined to the reputation of the performers, doubtless had much to do with the crowded attendance. While not free from defects, which were perfectly excusable under the circumstances, the representation appeared to give unqualified pleasure. Miss Wynne played the miller's daughter with an often admirable appreciation of the character, and sang all her music like the genuine artist she is. How her efforts were applauded on such an occasion there can be no need to tell. Miss Angele was an acceptable Lady Edith. Mr. Cummings looked Sir Percy to the life, and sang in his best style. Mr. Patey made a great "hit" by a really excellent rendering of his one song; and in Mr. Lewis Thomas was found a Deloraine not only able to do justice to the music, but to combine the truculent appearance of a smuggler captain with the exuberant good fellowship of an honest tar. Signor Randegger conducted the performance of his charming music, which owed a good deal to the steady and artistic pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. W. Henry Thomas.

THE FIGHT FOR THE CUP.

There is rejoicing among Cambria's ancient mountains and adown her lovely vales, for the leek has triumphed over the rose—the lion of England has succumbed to the beast, whichever it may be that represents the aborigines of our island. No generous Sassenach will grudge the Welsh their success. They deserved to win for the pluck they showed in coming so far, at the cost of so much time and money, with the sole hope of carrying away artistic renown. This year, of course, the South Wales Choral Union was obliged to make an appearance at Sydenham, because, as holders of the Challenge Cup, they could not do other than fight for its retention. But none the less on this account should the enterprise be appreciated which raised £2,000 for expenses, and led 500 men and women to quit their homes and journey to London with the chance of returning beaten and abashed. Such devotion to music and country deserved a reward, and every Englishman is quite prepared to applaud when the Welsh turn homewards with the precious Cup borne triumphantly at their head.

Thursday week was the day of battle, and it seemed as though the Principality had not only sent its musical representatives but had poured its population en masse towards Sydenham. Never before was such a gathering of the children of St. David on the Saxon side of the Marches. In point of fact, the Welsh took possession of the Palace, while the English, with the humble feeling becoming to a small minority, felt as abashed as do those of their nation who stray within the limits of an Eisteddfod. The Welsh tongue was heard everywhere, and the unmistakable Welsh face met the eye look where it would. There, too, were the chiefs of the Bardic orders—men of Eisteddfod renown, great at long-winded speeches, and at finding out occasions for making them. The shrewd, good-humoured countenance of Mynyddog might have been seen in a prominent position, and if his frequent colleague, Tanymarian, was absent, many another possessor of equally funny appellations put in an appearance. Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Brinley Richards graced the occasion with their presence, as a matter of course; and, taking voluminous notes, the reporters from a host of Welsh papers gave assurance that absent Cambrians would soon know all about it. The first contest in the day's programme was a sore trial to the proverbially slight stock of Welsh patience. What was it to the Principality whether the Liverpool, Bristol, or London choir of men's voices carried off the prize in their special class? True, Liverpool is sometimes called the capital of Wales, and when the judges pronounced in favour of the great sea-port, every Welshman present was, doubtless, prepared to recognise a cousin in every member of the victorious company. But this, gratifying so far as it went, went but a little way, so that it was a great relief when the three choirs cleared off the Handel orchestra, and left the field open for the Cambrian host. Then began the fuss, without a huge allowance of which our Welsh friends, like all Celts, cannot do the slightest thing. The singers swarmed upon the orchestra in long-enduring confusion, while a host of their chiefs bustled about the platform elaborately doing nothing with much pretence. One worthy and red-faced gentleman in particular—great at Eisteddfod meetings, we undertake to say—threatened a speech at the very beginning, and was now anxious to get it off his mind. He watched for a chance, as a cat watches a mouse-hole, and, had not the chance come as it did, there seemed danger to his health from a pressure of pent-up ideas. But everything has an end, even Welsh fussiness, so that, at last, the choir settled down in their places, the judges—Sir J. Benedict, Sir J. Goss, and Mr. Barnby—took theirs; the Eisteddfod leaders subsided, and "Caradoc"—a reduced portrait of the Claimant—made his apearance, bâton in hand. The pieces which the judges desired the choir to sing were Bach's motet, "I wrestle and pray," the "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's Mount of Olives; "See what love hath the Father," from Mendelssohn's St. Paul; and "Come with torches brightly flashing," from the Walpurgis Night. As the appointed jurors gave a decision from which there is no appeal, we shall not enter upon a detailed criticism of the Welsh singing. Enough that it was resolute, enthusiastic, and loud, to a degree absolutely exciting—even to a degree that made one unable to judge faultiness with coolness. The volume of sound, instinct with that human feeling which makes the voice the grandest of all instruments, carried everything before it. This was the case, especially in the "Hallelujah" and "Come with torches." The other pieces afforded no opportunity for noise, and in them the defects of the choir were made conspicuous—defects we may sum up in the expression, want of refinement. But everything was applauded alike by the crowd in the transept, who lost no chance of a cheer, and only ceased cheering because of alarm lest they might miss a pretext for even greater noise. After the Walpurgis Night chorus, the Welsh singers broke up and retired to the higher benches of the Handel orchestra. Then it was that attention fixed itself upon a comparatively small crowd of well-dressed people who had quietly taken the same position when the proceedings began. These were the champions of England—picked men and women from the Tonic Sol-faists of London, headed by Mr. Proudman, and ready to do battle for the honour of the metropolis. After the Welsh fuss, it was a treat to see how the more business-like English folk took their places. The thing was done, and Mr. Proudman was ready to begin, before the Eisteddfod orators had hustled one another off the platform on which they had no longer any business. But before the English choir had sung a note it was evident they had but little chance. Their numbers were few, they lacked the sturdy physique of their opponents, and, what is more, they lacked the ardour which made a champion of every vocalist in the Cambrian ranks. Hence their failure in such pieces as the "Hallelujah" and "Come with torches." But, if these pieces sounded tame and flat, a greater effect was made in others requiring more refinement and delicacy, Bach's motet being sung infinitely better than by the Welsh. In vain, however, did the Tonic Sol-faists rely upon their culture. Noise and enthusiasm won the day, and the conclusion was almost foregone when Mr. Willert Beale read out the fiat of the judges, awarding the Challenge Cup to the representatives of Wales. What a scene followed this announcement! The Welsh singers waved hats and handkerchiefs to the audience, who waved hats and handkerchiefs in return, both parties, meanwhile, shouting themselves hoarse, and growing redder and redder in the face. The Eisteddfod leaders came out now in earnest, more fussy than ever; and the sound of Welsh consonants rose up to the roof in one unbroken volume. Such a triumph was too exciting to last long. Speedily the crowd dispersed about the Palace to talk the matter over in calmer mood; congratulating the victors and passing unheedingly by the vanquished who had lost all save honour. About the subsequent concert we need not speak. Nor shall we tell how the Welsh met in the concert-room later to hear speeches on the mutual admiration principle, varied by others from their political representatives, showing a keen appreciation of the general election close at hand. All this had no particular interest. Enough that the Challenge cup goes again to Wales, whence it must be taken this time twelve months. THADDEUS EGG.

"Above all things, do not forget to go and see Jerome Coton." Such were the words addressed to me, when it was known I was starting for Lyons. I treated the recommendation rather slightingly, and forgot all about it for the first week after my arrival. But, when I had seen all that Lyons enserre (the expression is Jean Baptiste Rousseau's); when I had performed the pilgrimage to Our Lady of Fourvières; when I had followed the military movements at the Grand Camp; and when I had visited the looms of the Croix Rouge; after eating titlarks at the Swiss Cottage in the park of the Tête d'Or, and crabs' tails with Nantua sauce at the Café de Lyon; after admiring the flowers of Saint-Jean and of Berjon at the Museum; and after paying my indispensable visit to those eminent men, Louis Perrin and Aimé Vingtrinier, who continue the tradition handed down by the illustrious printers of the town, I remembered the name of Jerome Coton, and set about collecting the details of his history, which I now give in all sincerity and truth.

Jerome Coton, who calls himself "the first mimetic artist in France," is the father of the Lyons actors. He is not, however, very old; sixty-eight. He is spare, with a gallows look. He has a hollow prophetic voice. Under the first Empire, he was a soldier in the hundred and second of the Line: "the regiment of La Fourche." The peace restored him to his home and his trowel, for he is a plasterer by nature, and, even at the present day, fond of doing any little odd jobs. But melodrama had already made sad havoc with his simple mind. Hadrian Barberousse, and the Man of the Black Forest had appeared to him in his sleep; he dreamed of nothing save besieged fortresses, ruined donjons, and solitary huts; pleasure for him consisted in a sombre cloak; happiness, in a dark lantern; and paradise, in the Tour du Nord. He fancied he always woke at the noise of a signal, and felt mechanically for his pistols under his pillow. At length he yielded to the secret voice within him; he accepted an engagement. He was in turns Palmerin of England, Abelino, or the Man with three Faces, Teleki, and Mombars the Exterminator; he was, in fact, what he still is, the perfect incarnation of melodrama. He played some years at the Célestins, and made trips through the provinces in a radius of fifty leagues.

The new Rue de l'Impératrice cuts in its course the Rue de l'Argue, exactly at the site formerly occupied by a small theatre which I can compare to nothing better than to the Theatre of the Rue de la Tour d'Auvergne, in Paris. It was there that Jerome Coton had ended by installing himself with a company of his own, which he had recruited from among the people; it was there that he firmly held aloft the standard of melodrama, and that he struggled against the encroachments of vaudeville and of comedy, stopping his ears at the very name of Scribe, and regularly lighting his Bengal fires between eleven and twelve every night. Manager, stage-manager, and actor, he had, in his triple capacity, plenty to do, as the reader may well suppose. Thus it was nothing unusual to see him stop in the midst of a long speech to increase or diminish the light of a lamp—to behold him forget his part as Grand Master of the Knights of the Teutonic Order and whisper at the wings: "Just bring me the velvet arm-chair, will you?" Not only, however, has Jerome Coton been all we have mentioned; not only has he traversed all the circles in the infernal regions of the drama, which, according to competent judges, beat all other infernal regions whatever; but it was even reserved for him to be—a piece of scenery. Yes: a piece of scenery. A bridge was wanting in a military engagement. The fact was perceived only at the last moment, and the bridge was indispensable. Well! Jerome will be the bridge! He threw himself flat upon his stomach, and his body simulated the link between the two banks—not far from each other! Go and hang yourself, Rosambeau! you would never have thought of that!

Take Doyen; take Ricourt—you will never find anyone with the convictions, the passion, the enthusiasm of Jerome Coton. When his theatre in the Galerie de l'Argue was pulled down, he constructed another at the Guillottière, but it had not a long existence. It is in the neighbourhood of Lyons, at Rosaune, or St. Etienne, that, bowed by age but not vanquished, Jerome now goes about with the idols of Caiguiez, of Cuvelier, and of Pelletier-Volméranges. Now and then, too, he obtains permission to give a performance at the Célestins. Such an occasion is a day of joy for a portion of the population of Lyons; they enter the theatre singing; they applaud "before the candles are lighted," for Jerome is loved; Jerome is adored; his friends cannot offer him too many flowers or applaud him too much. The instant he appears, the most touching intimacy is established between him and the audience. "Good day, Coton!—bravo, Coton!" The interruptions are most cordial, but they do not respect the piece in course of representation: "Coton, don't listen to him, he is a traitor! Don't believe what he says; he mauled you badly just now. Coton! refuse his offer to shake hands!" Sometimes Jerome Coton endeavours to protest; he asks for silence. "Gentlemen," he says, advancing to the footlights, "you paralyse my powers!" —"That's true! Right you are, Coton. Well said, Coton; we will hold our tongues! Silence yonder!" And then the stamping of feet recommences more violently than ever.

In a military piece, La Chaumière Hongroise, or L'Espionne russe, I do not exactly know which, the French flag is buried under the snow. Jerome Coton arrives on the spot. With all his advantages, he combines the drawback of being very short-sighted. He looks for the flag; he stoops, but finds nothing. The spectators come to his assistance. "Not there, Coton," they cry. "Here! to your left! at the foot of the tree. That's it, Coton!" On another occasion, he has to eat a fowl. He seats himself at table. He attacks the bird, but his knife slips. He recommences without being more fortunate. "Don't you see that the fowl is tied, eh?" the audience cry. "Cut the string, Jerome!" Not very long since he was playing at the Alcazar in La Mort de Turenne. He sustained the part of Turenne—of course. He enters and perceives a young Conscript. "You will post yourself," he says to him, "before this avenue, by which the hostile army will debouch, and you will give us notice at the proper time!" O! virile and heroic candour! Turenne goes off, rubbing his hands. On being left alone, the Conscript makes a signal to a Vivandière, gulps down several glasses of wine-brandy, becomes gallant, and turns his back on the enemy's army. That army arrives and fires at the Conscript, who returns the compliment as well as he can. At the noise, our soldiers, headed by Turenne, come up, and easily disperse the foe.—"You have saved your country!" says Turenne to the young soldier. "Not a bit of it, not a bit of it, Coton!" exclaims the audience, deprecatingly. "He has saved nothing at all; he is a humbug; he was larking with the Vivandière!"—"You have saved your country," continues Turenne, turning a deaf hear to what is said, "and I will decorate you upon the field of battle." With these words, Jerome Coton prepares to take off his own cross, but his unfortunate short-sightedness interferes with the rapidity of his action. Hereupon the public observe: "Don't be in a hurry, Coton! Undo the knot quietly; don't be tearing anything, Coton! We have plenty of time."

But let us proceed still further with our Cotoniana.

JEROME COTON (raising his arms to heaven). Am I not indeed unfortunate!—a fragile plaything of fortune!—Everything conspires against me! THE PUBLIC. No, no, Coton; you know it's not true.—JEROME COTON (armed to the teeth). Cease to brave me, rash youth! Do you not know my power in this place? Do you not know my death may cause your ruin? THE PUBLIC. No such thing, Coton.—THE TYRANT. Come, let a brilliant festival crown this day; let the dances be arranged under my eyes, and let the cup-bearers fill up the goblets. Thy health, Spalatro! THE PUBLIC. Don't you drink, Coton, old boy: it would do you harm.—JEROME COTON (wandering in the deserted chapel). I hear the clock of the old castle strike midnight. THE CLOCK. One. THE PUBLIC (in chorus). One. THE CLOCK. Two. THE PUBLIC. Two! Quicker, quicker! THE CLOCK. Three. (The Clock stops at seven.) THE PUBLIC. Hulloa, Coton, where are the others? We have not got our lot! Your clock has something the matter with it; it is a gim-crack thing, after all.—JEROME COTON. Let us hide behind this tree, so as to watch our victim as he passes. He is far from thinking I am so near. THE PUBLIC. He can see you, Coton, the tree is too little. JEROME COTON. How long Sacripanti is before he appears. Who can detain him? (Puts out his head.) THE PUBLIC. Pee-bo!

It is generally on Easter Eve that the management places the Théâtre des Célestins at the service of Jerome Coton—and his company; for the regular members of the establishment declined long since the honour of sharing the ovations rendered to the first mimetic artist in France. On that evening, therefore, Jerome Coton shines without a rival. He changes his boots of untanned leather several times; he fights, in measure, with an axe; and he dances the "Anglaise" with a stick. He never confides to anyone but himself the care of drawing up his bills, in which he gives a course of history for every melodrama. The amateurs of Lyons preserve these productions so conducive to hilarity. Coton has given me a few of his bills. I transcribe the following: "NAPOLEON À SAINTE HELENE OU LA MORT DU GRAND HOMME. Par M. Dupenty. This work was created at the Théâtre de la Porte Saint-Martin. Three hundred representations (uncontested) attest its prodigious success, as well as at Lyons, where this masterpiece has not ceased to attract the masses, a fact which is within the knowledge of a large number of inhabitants, who made the journey that they might admire, under the features of Gobert and of Prudent, the great man who, despite the acts of injustice he had to suffer, his last breath was for the glory of our arms and the prosperity of France his mother country, who said, on quitting its beautiful shores: 'Adieu, beautiful France, land of the brave! Were there fewer traitors in thy bosom thou would still be the Queen of the World.' I need scarcely observe that it was Jerome Coton who sustained the part of Napoleon, or, rather, who re-created it, according to his own ingenious expression. He concluded the entertainment with Le Parleur éternel, and Madame Jerome Coton sang (I am copying the bill) 'Les Souvenirs du jeune âge,' from the Pré aux clercs, music by AUBER." At Tarare he announced "a grand pyrotechnic and amphibological illumination." I will proceed no further; the reader would think I was exaggerating. In one of his most recent performances at the Célestins, the play was Robert, the Brigand Chief. Fancy how much may be accumulated in a four-feet poster. "The infernal Tower—Deliverance of the Old Man; Nature has burst his bonds—Rosinski suspected—General Pardon for Robert and his comrades, terminating with a grand Tableau of Indulgence." On this occasion, being well up in the habits of his audience and mistrusting their enthusiasm, Coton considered it advisable to print the annexed notice: "Jerome Coton earnestly begs his compatriots and those strangers who embellish with their presence that pretty bonbon box, the Théâtre des Célestins, not to applaud during the course of this essentially philanthropic performance, except at the conclusion of the acts, if they feel so inclined; he repeats, for the second time, it hinders the progress of the work and of the artists who have joined him. Relying on the kindness and knowledge of the regular patrons of our two theatres, he does not doubt, for an instant, that they will receive his request favourably. He is the devoted and respectful servant of an enlightened public."

They were right in recommending to my notice Jerome Coton; he is the last chapter of a forgotten history which has never been written: the history of Melodrama. After him, nothing will be left of a branch of art so long famous.

It is thought in Montalluvah—though it was never demonstrated—that a modification of concentrated light forms the point of union between the immortal soul and the perishable portions of man.—Another World.

Madame Christine Nilsson leaves London for the Isle of Wight on Monday, for a brief repose. She then goes to Geneva, viâ Paris, thence returns to London, and thence (in the last week of August) sails for the United States.

Miss Neilson is at Long Branch.

Signor Giulio Alary has left London, for Paris.

A street in Berlin has been named after Beethoven.

The new Dresden Theatre will be opened next month.

Mr. Vittorio Maurel (Mr. Gye's new barytone), has left for Paris.

Mr. Oliver intends opening a short season at Montreal on July 5th.

The ballet has been definitively suppressed at the Florence Pergola.

Mr. Wilkie Collins will, it is stated, leave England for America in August.

Signor Petrella is writing a Requiem in commemoration of the late Mariani.

The Municipal Council of Naples has voted San Carlo a subvention of £10,000.

A Military Academy of Music is under consideration by the French Government.

A society has been formed in Madrid with a view to the establishment of a national opera.

"Lucca-here, now," is the way a Pittsburgh paper announced the presence of the cantatrice.

A monument to Carl Tausig has been erected in Berlin. It is a granite column, supporting a bust of the young virtuoso.

At a concert given in the Exhibition building at Vienna, forty-eight pianists played at the same time on twenty-four pianos.

It is said that Signor Nicolini is paid £500 a-month at Covent Garden Theatre. Pauvre Monsieur Gye!—DR. BLIDGE.

Mdme. Rudersdorff has taken a cottage at Swamscott, U.S., where she continues her instruction to pupils during the summer.

An official inventory of the goods, chattels, rights, and credits of the late Edwin Forrest has been published. It states the total value at $220,386.

A spectacular opera, founded on the same subject as Auber's La Bayadère, and called Zoloe, has been produced at Aiken's Theatre, Chicago.

Mr. M. Koppitz, who has been long the leader of the Globe Theatre orchestra, Boston, died quite suddenly of diabetes, at the Victoria Hotel, St. John's, N. B.

"KNOW'ST THOU THE LAND."—Those who are anxious to know the real "Harpy Land" should visit some of the West-end London theatres. —Liverpool Porcupine.

An Australian journalist, has received a spiritual communication that the world is to be "burned black as a forgotten toast by a wave of fire," within a year.

News was sent to Mr. Barnum, written on the back of a card, by the elephant trainer, as follows: "Mr. Barnum one of the elifants is ded. He dyed of enformation."

There are a dozen organists in this city, whose salaries range from $2500 to $3000. $5000 is said to be not an unusual price for first-class sopranos in church choirs.

The Guide Musical says that M. Colyns, the Belgian violinist, has been engaged by Mr. Mapleson for a tour in Ireland and Scotland during January and February next.

Mr. Robert Bonner will erect in Mount Auburn Cemetery, near Boston, a monument to the memory of Fanny Fern. It will consist of an Italian marble pedestal, on a granite plinth—the whole surmounted with a Roman cross wreathed with fern leaves.

The reproof of Appelles to some painter whose works exhibited more effect than beauty might well be applied to the noisy and sensational productions of certain musical composers of the present day: "You make them rich, because you cannot make them beautiful!"

The attention of managers of musical entertainments is drawn to two very clever juvenile artists, the Misses Alice and Laura Molteno (harp, piano, and violin). They have lately returned from America, where they played at concerts in which Madame Anne Bishop, and other artists of note, assisted. We see, from the different notices of the American press, that they everywhere met with great success.

Mdlle. Victoria Bunsen, the charming young contralto of Her Majesty's Opera, has left London for a month's visit to her family in her native town, Lyseki hl, Sweden.

The "Recital" announced for Wednesday last, by Miss Pollon (pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes), was postponed, owing to the indisposition (temporary it is hoped) of the young pianist.

Messrs. Strakosch and Muzio have left Paris for Italy, to complete their engagements of artists for an operatic season in New York, and also to purchase new scenery and costumes for Aida.

The great Wagnerian Festival at Bayreuth is again postponed —this time till the spring of 1875. Subscriptions towards the expenses have, as yet, reached no higher than 140,000 florins.

Miss Florence Ashton (contralto), Mr. Compton (son of the well known Haymarket comedian), and Miss Compton (pianist), are about to start upon a provincial tour with an entertainment composed of recitations, interspersed with vocal, and instrumental music.—W. S. J.

The Strand Dramatic Club, on Saturday, July 12th, gave a highly successful performance, at the King's Cross Theatre, of The Ticket-of-leave Man, and the first act of The Colleen Bawn. The performers met with great applause. Mr. C. J. Bishenden sang "Hearts of Oak," etc. and also met with a most enthusiastic reception.

An enraptured Texas editor thus gives his impressions of an opera: "The aroma of violets exudes from it as though every note were an odorous petal whose exquisite scent is carried to the finer nerves of the brain upon the balmy air of sound, dying away in melodious and evanescent falls, and swelling with the richness of perfumed life into being again, until the soul is wrapped in a mantle of sensuous delight that makes it faint with rapture."

At a national singing match the other day, in the Crystal Palace, the Tonic Sol-fa Association Choir contended with the South Wales Choral Union. The palm of excellence was awarded to the Cambrian vocalists, a result which will not astonish those who consider that, whereas simple Welsh music consists of sweet sounds, the notes of the association called Tonic Sol-fa may be conceived to be of an opposite quality, as tonics are mostly bitter.—Punch.

The Liverpool Porcupine says, apropos of the success of the Liverpool Men's Voice Choir at Sydenham:—

"Had we the effrontery of turf tipsters, we could easily explain how we had "said all along the Liverpool choir would pull it off." But, not having done anything of the kind, we can but express our extreme pleasure that the Liverpool choir has not only been "placed very creditably," as we were sure it would, but has proved the premier, which we were afraid it wouldn't. The competing choirs were not numerous, certainly; yet our representative choir has come out of it with honour and the prize. While we repeat our praise of Mr. Sanders' endeavours to secure efficiency, we must reiterate our hope that on the next occasion local competition will precede the selection of the representative singers, and all sections of the musical community will be duly represented. Present victory should not make us too confident, but rather urge to careful preparation for future competition, which assuredly will be more exacting."

Mrs. Fanny Kemble, in her journal of her tour in America, gives an amusing account of a performance of the last scene of Romeo and Juliet, not as it seemed to the spectators, but as it really was, with the whispered communications of the actors. Romeo, at the words, "Quick! let me snatch thee to thy Romeo's arms," pounced upon his playfellow, plucked her up in his arms, "like an uncomfortable bundle," and staggered down the stage with her. Juliet whispers, "Oh, you've got me up horribly! That'll never do; let me down. I'ray let me down!" But Romeo proceeds, from the acting version of the play, be it understood:

"There, breathe a vital spirit on thy lips,
And call thee back, my soul, to life and love!"

Juliet continues to whisper: "Pray put me down; you'll certainly throw me down if you don't set me on the ground directly." "In the midst of 'cruel, cursed fate,' his dagger fell out of his dress. I, embracing him tenderly, crammed it back again, because I knew I should, want it at the end." The performance thus went on:

Romeo. Tear not my heart-strings thus!
They break! they crack! Juliet! Juliet! [Dies.
Juliet (to Corpse). Am I smothering you?
Corpse. Not at all. But could you, do you think, be so kind as to put my wig on again for me? It has fallen off.
Juliet (to Corpse). I am afraid I can't; but I'll throw my muslin veil over it. You've broken the phial, haven't you? (Corpse nodded.)
Juliet (to Corpse). Where's your dagger?
Corpse (to Juliet). 'Pon my soul I don't know.

Mr. Edmund Rosenthal's Opera Bouffe company open the Exeter Theatre on Monday next, in Genevieve de Brabant, which threatens eventually to rival the eccentric Grand Duchess of Gerolstein.—W. S. J.

The competition for the "Grand Prix de Rome," at the Paris Conservatoire, has resulted in the awarding of the first prize to M. Puget, a pupil of M. Victor Massé; the second prize to M. Hillemarcher, and "honourable mention" to M. Corbaz-Marmontel, pupils of M. François Bazin.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The first representation of La Belle Hélène was given at the St. James's Theatre, on Saturday evening last, to a crowded house, and on the whole was very well done. M. Mario-Widmer sang and acted capitally, but was inclined to make too free a use of his falsetto voice, a habit not always to be commended. Messrs. Charlin and Jolly were irresistibly funny, especially the latter, whose facial expression and inimitable bye-play is a study in itself. Mdlle. Desclauzas sang and acted with her usual intelligence, and if she does not reach our ideal of "La Belle Hélene," it is not her fault.

Some few days ago, Dr. White, author of Echoes of Many Lands, having had occasion to call at the residence of a gentleman in the vicinity of Waterford, was rushed upon by a furious dog and severely lacerated by the animal. The bite of a dog is at any time a very serious matter, but is especially so at the present season. The law in this case has been violated by allowing the animal to go abroad unmuzzled, and it is probable when the matter is investigated the brute will be destroyed. The mental anxiety of the sufferer must be extreme. He is completely incapacitated from pursuing his avocations, and is at present confined to his chambers under medical treatment.—Freeman's Journal, July 16.

GANDERSHEIM.—The monument raised to Herr Methfessel, the well known song-composer, was formally consecrated in the Heckenbecker Cemetery on the 30th ult.

NAPLES.—A new semi-serious opera, I due Soci, by Signor Pietro Guarino, will shortly be produced at the Teatro Filarmonico.

Lines for Music.

THE PAGE.

I.

Ah! what a gay and a happy life mine,
I never feel sad, so I never repine:
No trouble or pain e'er crosseth my path,
Nought but pleasure and love my young heart hath.
The richest of doublets and hosen I wear,
And jauntiest of caps surmounts my long hair;
The finest of daggers hangs by my side
To guard my lord's crest with envious pride.
While him I e'er follow faithful and true
In deeds of great brav'ry—or help him to woo—
I, his true-hearted page, who'd lay down his life
For the sake of his lord's in the sternest of strife.

II.

Successful in love? unequalled am I,
For one glance from me how many maids sigh!
Not one is there lives who'd deny me her hand
At home or in any strange foreign land.
From Spain to the East they all own my sway,
And, hapless, remember me many a day.
No lattice is there but I'd climb with skill,
For nothing can daunt a resolute will.
So I chant and I love the livelong day,
And merrily pass the sweet time away;
While I follow my lord in peace or the fight—
Till the day when I too 'll be just such a knight.

ADOLFO FERRARI.

THE FORMATION AND CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE FOR SINGING.

Price 12s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, REGENT STREET, W.

"The remarkable qualities of this book are the author's freedom from conventional trammels, the strong sense of his opinions, and the novelty yet evident soundness of his precepts; his work has consequently come into general use as a manual of vocal instruction."—Daily News.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE,

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat,

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis of Basingstoke says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

WALTER MAYNARD'S SYSTEM OF INSTRUCTION.

MUSIC COPY BOOKS,

Nos. 1 to 6, Price 6d. each.

TRANSPARENT MUSIC SLATE.

Price 8s.

A knowledge of the construction of Music is acquired in the readiest and most simple manner by this method of teaching.

No attempt is made to introduce a new theory, either in the Copy Books r Transparent Slate.

Music being acknowledged as a universal language, its orthodox notation, rules, and signs, are explained and illustrated according to a plan which any novice can understand, and by which they cannot fail to become indelibly impressed upon the memory.

The system, although but recently published, is already approved and encouraged by every reliable authority upon the subject of musical education.

To beginners its simplicity renders it invaluable; to those who have acquired certain mechanical or vocal facility, but who are deficient in musical knowledge, it has proved more useful than any other method of education, owing to the facilities it offers of self-help.

The Music Copy Books contain a progressive course of instruction in music, leading up to some of the most advanced branches of harmony.

SEQUEL TO THE ABOVE—Price 6d.
KEY TO THE SEQUEL—Price 6d.

The following quotations from the Press show the favourable reception with which the new system has met from the most influential Art Critics of the day:—

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes a very novel application of a very familiar help to knowledge. The system is of manifest value. It impresses 'hard facts' upon the mind in a fashion not less easy than agreeable."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Walter Maynard makes the study of music a pleasing amusement, and the early tasks of students delightful. He has cleared away a great deal of difficulty in their paths, and made intelligible much that would otherwise be dark and obscure."—News of the World.

"We could wish to see this excellent system of Mr. Maynard's followed in the public schools of the country The necessity of teaching music seems to us palpable, and the necessity once admitted, can there be a better mode of instructing it than by the system which Mr. Maynard has originated? The instructions are simple and easy to retain in the mind. Mr. Maynard smooths every difficulty that can be smoothed."—Lloyd's.

"The means of obtaining knowledge are interesting and agreeable, and the knowledge thus obtained will be solid and lasting. Time and labour are recognized, thought and intention are inculcated, encouraged and rewarded."—Orchestra.

"To schools and teachers the system will be invaluable, and for classes it offers advantages that no other system possesses."—Weekly Times.

"That part of the work devoted to harmony will be especially welcome to all teachers who, while anxious to give their pupils some intelligent notion of what music really is, have found great difficulty in finding suitable instructions."—Echo.

"The observations of the author, and his instructions for the pianoforte, harmony, and vocalisation, are admirable. Assuredly, we wish him success in this, his new scheme of teaching music."—Evening Standard.

"Calculated largely to facilitate the task of popular musical education. The plan is a novel one, the chief principle of which is the exercise of the pupil's memory by first copying the exercise at the head of one page, and then writing it entirely from recollection."—Daily News.

"We consider it an easy and excellent way of obtaining a complete knowledge of music, with comparatively little trouble."—Digitale.

"These books may be regarded in a two-fold capacity—first, as books of ordinary instruction; second, as making an extraordinary application of a familiar educational device. Their value in both respects is manifest. The lessons are comprehensive and clearly expressed, so that the student finds all that it is necessary for him to know in the early stage of his career. We, therefore, strongly recommend these books, both for home and school use."—Musical World.

"We have no doubt that Mr. Maynard's work will be adopted by teachers, whose labour it will be found to simplify very greatly, while it will materially aid the student."—Manchester Guardian.

"It will probably form a greater help to the acquisition of music than any educational work with the same object that has yet been published."—Leeds Mercury.

"Mr. Walter Maynard has done a good service to the students of music."—Leamington Courier.

"Particularly suited to those disposed to the practice of self-help, as well as to those who can afford the aid of a professor."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"We highly recommend these books to the attention of music teachers, and those who wish to learn music easily, cheaply, and thoroughly. No such cheap and able class books have been before seen by us."—Edinburgh Evening Courant.

"A very useful idea, that will lighten the drudgery of music."—Malvern News.

"It is impossible to praise too highly this series of Copy Books. If anything will induce a young pupil to prosecute a progressive study of music, these Copy Books may be relied upon to do so."—Glasgow Daily Herald.

"The plan is excellent, the labour imposed is very trifling, and if the exercises are carefully written they will be a great help in enabling the pupil to remember what has been previously learned."—Birmingham Morning News.

"The Copy Book feature, which requires the learner to transcribe what is put before him, and to commit to paper numerous and valuable exercises, is an advantage apparent at first sight, especially with regard to the studies in notation and harmony."—Sunday Times.

Sweet hawthorn time—fair month of May!
What joys attend thine advent gay!
On every tree the birdies sing,
From hill and dale glad echoes ring;
The lark, inspir'd, to Heav'n ascends,
The gurgling brook in beauty wends
By mossy bank and grassy brae,
Where violets bloom and lambkins play.
Delightful Spring—sweet month of May
What joys attend thine advent gay!

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The annual public concert of this useful and well-conducted institution, held in the Hanover Square Rooms on Saturday afternoon, created the usual interest among friends of the pupils and amateurs of music generally. The programme afforded incontestable proof that the system of instruction carried on is sound, that the teachers in all departments are capable, and that the "Principal," Sir Sterndale Bennett, is the right man in the right place. Further than this, it may be added, that the students in every branch of the art exhibit decided advance. The programme, though lengthy, was nevertheless always more or less interesting. The original compositions included the first movement of an orchestral symphony in C by Mr. Roberts (pupil of Sir Sterndale Bennett); the first movement of a symphony in B minor by Miss Florence Marshall (pupil of Mr. G. A Macfarren); two movements (andante and scherzo) from a choral symphony in E minor, by Mr. Wingham ("silver medallist" in 1870); and two movements (andante and scherzo) from a symphony in C minor by Mr. Eaton Faning (Mendelssohn scholar, and silver medallist, 1872). In each of these there was a great deal to commend, and above all a promise which encourages the fairest hopes.

The instrumental solo performances comprised Sir Sterndale Bennett's Caprice in E major, one of the most finished and original pieces ever written for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments—the pianist being Miss Pamphilon (pupil of Mr. W. Dorrell); the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat (his fifth and last), pianist, Mr. Walter Fitton ("silver medallist," 1872), pupil of Mr. Walter C. Macfarren; the last two movements of Spohr's Concertante in B minor, for two violins, admirably executed by Messrs. Reed and Szczepanowski (pupils of M. Sainton, and worthy representatives of their eminent preceptor); three movements from Spohr's Quintet in C minor, for pianoforte, flute, clarionet, horn, and bassoon, the pianoforte part being assigned to Miss Baglehole, Potter Exhibitioner, silver medallist, and Sterndale Bennett prize-holder (the most talented pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, a professor of the pianoforte, who has, and has long had, no superior); the first movement of Schumann's Concerto in A minor, played by Miss Conolly (pupil of Mr. W. G. Cusins, director of music to the Queen); the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in D minor (No. 2), performed by Miss Curtis (pupil of Mr. Westlake); and J. S. Bach's grand pedal fugue in C minor, played by Mr. Done, son of the well-known organist of Worcester Cathedral and conductor of the Worcester Festivals. In all of these enough of ability was displayed to satisfy the most exacting patron of our Royal Academy of Music, which was convincingly shown by the applause so liberally bestowed. In the Quintet of Spohr the parts for wind instruments were undertaken by those experienced professors, Messrs. Svendsen (flute), C. Harper (horn), Lazarus (clarionet), and Waetzig (bassoon).

A mere glance at the vocal music will suffice. The solos included an air from Mozart's Seraglio ("Ah che voglio trionfare,"), sung by Mr. Pope; an air from Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria (our English masterpiece in sacred music), sung by Mr. Walter Fitton (silver medallist in 1872); "Hear ye Israel" from Mendelssohn's Elijah, sung by Miss Jessie Jones, who gained the first soprano prize at Mr. Willert Beale's recent National Music Meetings in the Crystal Palace; the tenor air, "Dalla sua pace," from Don Giovanni, sung by Mr. Henry Guy (silver medallist in 1872); and a bravura air, from Handel's Ottone, sung by Mr. Wadmore, to whom was also awarded a prize at the Crystal Palace National Music Meetings last year.

Besides these, there was concerted vocal music of more than ordinary interest. First must be mentioned the ingeniously contrived and dramatically effective finale from Mr. Macfarren's opera Robin Hood, in which the solo vocal parts were taken by Misses Nessi Goode and Beasley, Messrs Dudley Thomas, Wadmore, Parker, and W. A. Howells. Next came a part song, "The Crier," by Miss Oliveria Prescott (student), which seemed to please very much; then the fine trio, "Night's lingering shades," from Spohr's once universally popular Azor and Zemira—sung by Misses Beasley, Jessie Jones, and Mayfield (silver medallist, 1871); then the always popular and in its way matchless duet from Der Freischütz, "Come be gay," allotted to Misses Llewellyn, Bagnall, and Nessi Goode; and, lastly, the beautiful trio with chorus, "Hearts feel that love thee," from Mendelssohn's Athalie, the solo parts in which were undertaken by Misses Bagnard, Edouard, and Bolton. These, too, afforded unequivocal satisfaction, as guarantees of the progress made by the pupils now being educated at our national musical seminary, which, since its institution in 1822, and incorporated by Royal Charter, has done so much for the legitimate progress of music in this country. The chief conductor was Mr. Walter Cecil Macfarren, than whom one more thoroughly fitted for the task could hardly have been selected.

After Spohr's quintet the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Gladstone, to whom Sir Sterndale Bennett previously delivered the subjoined address:—

"Madame,—As Principal of this Institution, allow me again to return you my sincere thanks for the honour you have done the directors and the committee in consenting to attend here this morning. I feel great pleasure, in which I am sure you will participate, in telling you that the number of students has considerably increased, more than 40 having entered this year, and the total at present being over 200. In an artistic sense the standard of excellence has been raised, and I have no hesitation in stating that we have found talent so remarkable and so greatly in excess of former years that it is a pleasure to us to increase those rewards which you have so kindly undertaken to distribute. I cannot let this opportunity pass without referring to the kind interest taken in the welfare of the Royal Academy of Music, and the advancement of the art of music in this country, by his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh and the authorities of the Royal Albert Hall. The propositions made to us from time to time have been seriously considered; but it was found that we should not be justified in incurring the expenditure attendant on the removal of the institution, and, as the new accommodation offered presented but slight advantages over the premises we now occupy, we felt compelled to decline. In conclusion, I beg to tender my sincere thanks to the committee, professors, subprofessors, and the officers of the institution for their untiring zeal and activity in each of their departments. The success which has followed their efforts you, Mrs. Gladstone, will now have the opportunity of estimating."

Mrs. Gladstone distributed the prizes in the most gracious manner, with a kind word or look for each favoured recipient. Here is a catalogue, in which many readers will find interest:—

Female Department.—Silver Medals.—Misses Emily A. Troup (pianoforte), Elizabeth Conolly (pianoforte), Amy E. Turner Burnett (pianoforte), Mary Taylor (general progress), Jessie Jones (singing), and Sarah A. Goode (singing). Bronze Medals.—Misses Emma Cornish, Isabella W. M'Carty, Eliza J. Hopkins, Emma L. Beasley, Llewellyn Bagnall, Alice Mary Curtis, Lavinia Sheenan, Johanna Ludovici, and Beata Francis. Books.—Misses Helen Pamphilon, Ellen Edridge, Maria Combs, Ethel Harraden, Catherine Beaumont, Mary Roffe, Clara Buley, Ellen Hancock, Elinor Blake, Edith Brand, Alice Chapman, Janie Burrough, Hannah Edouard, Mary E. Butterworth, and Mrs. Florence Marshall. Letters of Commendation.—Misses Louisa A. Turner, Jane Whittaker, Constance Harper, Annie Bradley, Elizabeth L. Rothwell, Marion Green, and Fanny Boxell. Sterndale Bennett Prize (Purse containing ten guineas).—Miss Annie Jane Martin. Highly Commended.—Miss Agnes A. Channell (silver medallist, 1872). Male Department.—Silver Medals.—Master Harry Walker (pianoforte), and Mr. W. A. Howells (singing). Bronze Medals.—Messrs. Frederick Weekes, Frederick Done, Bernard E. Elmenhorst, J. L. Wadmore, and Henry A. Pope. A Prize Violin Bow, given to the institution by Mr. James Tubbs, of Wardour Street.—Mr. John H. Reed. Books.—Messrs. T. Matthay, Henry W. Little, Arthur J. Jackson, Edwin Hinchcliffe, Henry R. Rose, Dudley Thomas, Joseph A. Breeden, Alexander G. Jopp, Robert George, Louis N. Parker, Ladislas Szczepanowski, Charles J. Regan, Alfred Rhodes, and John H. Roberts. Sterndale Bennett Scholarship (two years free education in the institution).—Master Tobias Augustus Matthay (re-elected in April last). Westmorland Scholarship (£10 towards the cost of a year's instruction), awarded to Miss Emma L. Beasley. Potter Exhibition (£12 towards the cost of a year's instruction), awarded to Miss Florence Baglehole. Mendelssohn Scholarship (£20 per annum, for two years), awarded to Mr. Eaton Faning.

Altogether the proceedings augured well for the future progress of the Royal Academy of Music, which, we think, has acted wisely in preserving its independent position. If it cannot continue to exist as it has existed for so long a period, it has really no pretence to exist at all. We believe sincerely that it can—more especially with such a musician for its chief director and pilot as Sir W. Sterndale Bennett.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

A meeting of the General Committee of the Musical Festival was held recently, at the Midland Institute, for the purpose of receiving a report from the Orchestral Committee, and other business. Mr. W. J. Beale presided; and there were also present Messrs. W. Sharp, T. Kenrick, J. H. Nettlefold, C. S. Mathews, R. H. Milward, Chesshire, J. Cartland, H. Peyton, A. Peyton, R. Heaton, G. Heaton, C. Lawden, R. Chamberlain, F. Everitt, C. J. Parsons, F. Thornton, A. S. Blanckensee, Captain Peel, Dr. Foster, Alderman Brinsley, Mr. Howard J. Smith (secretary), &c. Letters of apology for non attendance were received from the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, the Mayor (Alderman Biggs), Major-General Herbert, Rev. G. D. Boyle, Mr. A. Kenrick, Colonel Ratcliff, Mr. G. J. Johnson, Mr. O. Pemberton, Mr. M. Hickman, and others.

The minutes of the last general meeting having been read and confirmed, Mr. R. Peyton read the following report of the Orchestral Committee:—

"Since the last meeting of this committee, the Orchestral Committee have had under consideration the scheme of performances, and have now to submit for your approval an outline of the principal works which it is intended should be given at the Festival. Among the new works composed for the forthcoming Festival, of which, as already announced, there are three—the most important, both from its sacred character and its length, is that of Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan. This oratorio, which will occupy the Wednesday morning, is entitled The Light of the World, and the Orchestral Committee have reason to hope that the labour which has been bestowed upon this work by our young and talented countryman will result in the production of a musicianly work of a high order, and such a one as will obtain for its composer a still higher position than heretofore among the musicians of our time. Of the two new secular cantatas, that of Signor Randegger is entitled Fridolin; while the story selected by Signor Schira, for musical illustration, is the same which has furnished the subject for one of the Poet Laureate's miscellaneous poems, namely 'The Lord of Burleigh.' The whole of the choruses of the second of these works, and most of those comprised in the first, have been in active preparation for some time past at the rehearsals now in progress. While naming the above works as having been secured for performance at the Festival, and designed expressly for it, the Orchestral Committee had the gratification of announcing that they are in negotiation for, and have reason to believe that they shall be able to include in the programme, four short works by Rossini, two of which have never been performed in this country; while the two others are from among the unpublished posthumous works of the great composer, and will be performed for the first time at the approaching Festival. These compositions have, since the death of Rossini, become the property of a private gentleman, who, at the instance of Sir Michael Costa, has kindly consented to their production at this Festival, under certain arrangements which are now in course of progress. It is not proposed, on the present occasion, to give any sonata or concerto for the pianoforte, but the Orchestral Committee submit that it would be desirable to recur to a practice which was formerly in vogue at these Festivals—namely, to introduce a symphony in one, at least, of the evening programmes. This question has been under consideration, and referred to, between the chairman and Sir Michael Costa on different occasions for some time past, and Sir Michael most willingly concurs, provided it is the opinion of the committee that a lengthened instrumental performance would be generally acceptable to the audience. The Orchestral Committee are fully aware that at the evening performances music of a lighter character, and less exacting upon the close attention of a large miscellaneous audience, is expected to be given. While, however, recognising this fact as a general guide in the construction of the evening programmes, they are at the same time unwilling to believe that one of the masterpieces of that great composer who so especially excelled in instrumental composition would be out of place when presented to the audience assembled at a Birmingham Festival. The Orchestral Committee, therefore, propose that a symphony of Beethoven should form a prominent feature in the Wednesday evening programme. The general outline of performances would, therefore, be as follows:

Tuesday morning.—Elijah.

Tuesday evening.—Cantata, Fridolin (Randegger), and miscellaneous second part.

Wednesday morning.—Mr. Sullivan's new oratorio, "The Light of the World.

Wednesday evening.—Miscellaneous concert, to include a Short Composition by Rossini, and Symphony, in C minor—Beethoven.

Thursday morning.—The Messiah.

Thursday evening.—Cantata, The Lord of Burleigh (Schira), and miscellaneous. Second part to include Chorus (Rossini), and Overture to Guillaume Tell.

Friday morning.—Sacred Cantata, God, Thou art great, Spohr; Imperial Mass, Haydn; Short Choral Work (first time of performance), Rossini; double choruses from Israel in Egypt.

Friday evening.—Judas Maccabæus.

"In preparation for the above series of performances, the members of the choir have been engaged weekly since the end of January last in rehearsing the choral music; Mr. W. C. Stockley and Mr. A. J. Sutton, with their accustomed assiduity and talent, conducting the rehearsals of the two sections into which, up to the present time, the choir has been divided. General rehearsals of the whole number of local choristers will commence in the first week in June, and you will be asked to pass a resolution requesting the Council of the Birmingham and Midland Institute to grant the use of their Lecture Theatre for the above purpose. In the instrumental department there has been a considerable number of changes by death, removal, or otherwise, since the Festival of 1870. These vacancies have been satisfactorily filled, and the whole orchestra, with some few exceptions, is now complete, separate engagements having, as usual, been entered into with each performer.

"The engagement of principal singers is one which has occupied the attention of the Orchestral Committee for a considerable time past, and much negotiation has taken place, both at personal interviews with the chairman and by letter. Most of the artists of highest rank as executants of oratorio music have already signed their engagements, and negotiations opened with other singers of note, whose presence might add variety and brilliancy to the evening performances. It must, however, be remarked that, in regard to the possible engagement of performers of high reputation, especially those whose fame extends to continental capitals and the great cities of America, the difficulties are somewhat increased by the period of the year at which our festivals are held, that period being devoted to rest, at some Continental watering-place after the labours of the London season, and preparatory to lengthened journeys to fulfil other engagements in the United States, St. Petersburg, and Vienna."

Mr. Peyton added that the new works were in progress, and would no doubt be received in time for their proper performance at the Festival. Besides those which had been accepted by the committee many other works had been offered, some by gentlemen who had composed works for the Festival before, and others by composers not known in Birmingham. The works chosen had been selected with great care, and for certain reasons which had had weight with the committee, who hoped the programme would be approved generally as an attractive one. With reference to the selection of a work by M. Gounod, Mr. Peyton said the committee hoped M. Gounod would some day take his place as one of the composers for these Festivals. They believed they might have included some short work of his at the ensuing Festival: but M. Gounod told them there was not the necessary time to undertake the composition of a large work. The gentleman who had undertaken their large work (Mr. Sullivan) had done it in a shorter time than M. Gounod would have required for a similar work. Having seen M. Gounod, he (Mr. Peyton) had taken upon himself to invite him to the Festival, in the hope that he would make himself acquainted with the sacred music performed there; but as he would then be on the Continent he would not be able to be present. The committee had had their eye upon M. Gounod for some time; it was impossible that a man of his eminence should not be regarded by them, and they hoped that he would compose a great work for the Birmingham Festival, which, from the communications laid before them, he was fully disposed to do. With regard to the performance of one of Beethoven's symphonies, which had often been mooted, the committee thought there ought to be a large portion of the audience who would desire to hear so important a work by such a band, and such means as they had at their disposal. It was a matter of regret to the committee that they had such an orchestra sitting idle, when merely a song or an Italian duet was being sung, and they thought there ought to be more instrumental music. As there was so large a number of persons among the audience who were musicians, a symphony of Beethoven was not only admissible but called for; and as there was an opportunity of including it in the programme for Wednesday evening, unless the general committee were of opinion that it was undesirable, they should include it. With regard to the engagement of the principal singers, that would come before the committee at the next meeting. They liked to postpone the engagements as long as they could in order to see what the London season brought forth.

The Chairman moved the adoption of the report, and the approval of the action of the Orchestral Committee, and observed that the performance of a symphony was a subject upon which opinions varied; but, as they had one of the best bands that could be collected, the committee thought it was an occasion when a symphony should be performed.—Mr. Parsons seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

The Chairman then moved that the scheme of performances recommended by the committee be adopted, with such alterations as circumstances might render necessary.—Mr. Everitt seconded the resolution, observing that he hoped no circumstance would render necessary the omission of the symphony proposed by Mr. Peyton.—The proposition was carried unanimously.

The Chairman proposed that the vice-presidents who were invited on the last occasion, with some few additions, be again invited to act as vice-presidents for the ensuing Festival. The additions were the Marquis of Hertford, Lord Yarmouth, the Bishops of Lichfield, Hereford, and Gloucester, Lord Clarendon, Lord Lewisham, and Mr. Lucy, of Charlecote.—Alderman Brinsley seconded the motion, and it was adopted.

On the proposition of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. C. Lawden, it was also resolved that the various sub-committees, when appointed, be instructed to observe strict economy, and take care that no expenditure is authorised which is not necessary for promoting the interests of the Festival.

The advertising and ticket and book committees were appointed; and a resolution was passed respectfully requesting the Council of the Midland Institute to grant the use of the Lecture Theatre for the choral rehearsals.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman for presiding concluded the business of the meeting.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The season was brought to an end on Saturday night, with a very effective performance of Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, in which, as before, Madame Adelina Patti and M. Faure represented the chief characters, the subordinate parts (also as before) being allotted to Mesdames Sinico and Demeric Lablache, Mdlle. Sassi, Signors Bettini, Ciampi, Edardi, Capponi, Tagliafico, Raguer, and Manfredi. Signor Vianesi conducted in the orchestra. At the termination of the opera—followed, in accordance with traditional custom, by "God save the Queen"—Madame Patti (who gave the solo verses in our National Anthem) was summoned no less than four times before the curtain. The name of M. Faure was also loudly and repeatedly called; but that distinguished artist was probably more than content with the honours which had been paid to him after the first and second acts. At any rate, he did not answer the call. The house was crowded to the ceiling, and the opera, one of Meyerbeer's most brilliant and characteristic, in its peculiar way—indeed, one of his very best—has seldom been more keenly enjoyed.

The other representations during last week might be dismissed in a paragraph, not because they were in any sense devoid of interest, but because they were, for the greater part, repetitions.

First, there was the magnificent Huguenots, with Madame Adelina Patti, in lieu of Mdlle. d'Angeri, as the heroine. Although this fresh effort, brilliant as it undoubtedly was, has not changed our opinion that Valentine is among those characters which, for certain reasons, do not lie easily within the means of one to whom almost every part in every style seems to come as easily as though she were born to it, there were features in Mdme. Patti's impersonation which placed it apart from any other Valentine we have seen. It is subtly conceived, and has been conscientiously studied throughout; and in one scene especially—the scene which follows the "Benediction of the Swords" (the famous duet between Valentine and Raoul), Madame Patti's singing and acting were beyond all praise, never, indeed, having been surpassed in our remembrance. Signor Nicolini, as Raoul de Nangis, if not invariably up to the mark, was always earnest, graceful, and manly in bearing, and evidently inspired by the genius of his gifted companion. The other characters were filled as usual.

Tuesday was marked by the appearance of a new soprano, Mdme. Pezzotta, who, as Amelia in Verdi's Ballo in Maschera, created a certain impression, but not such as to justify any hope that she has a chance of maintaining a position among the favoured prime donne of the Royal Italian Opera. That Madame Pezzotta possesses ability both as actress and singer is unquestionable—as unquestionable as that she brings to her task both spirit and intelligence, and this was shown in more instances than one; yet, despite a good deal of applause from time to time, the general verdict could not be looked upon as favourable.

On Wednesday week there was a grand concert, in which nearly all the principal artists of the establishment took part; but, as the programme consisted almost exclusively of familiar pieces, heard not only at the operatic representations of the season, but at the attractive morning concerts which Mr. Gye has been giving, Saturday after Saturday, in that picturesque out-house, "Floral Hall," the performance does not call for detailed criticism, and the mere record of its success must suffice. On Thursday "the immortal Barbiere" was repeated, "for the benefit of Mdme. Adelina Patti." Such a brilliant audience is not often assembled in a theatre, nor an audience more enthusiastic. How Madame Patti was received by her admirers, who, it can safely be asserted, included every one present, may be readily imagined. From the first peep at Rosina, at the window of Bartolo's house, to the moment when she grasps the hand of Almaviva, as her accepted spouse, the evening was a veritable fête for the charming songstress. She was applauded "to the echo" again and again, not only in "Una voce poco fa," and the duet with Figaro ("Dunque io son"), but in the "Shadow Song," from Dinorah, and "Home, sweet home," both (incongruously, we cannot but think, notwithstanding the long traditional tolerance of such interpolations) introduced in the "Lesson scene." To describe the scene at the end is out of our power. So many bouquets, wreaths, coronals, streamers, lyres, and what not, have rarely been thrown at the feet of a singer. If such demonstrations any are of worth, we cannot think of one who, by arduous and unremitting application, united to exceptional natural endowments, has deserved them better than Adelina Patti. She came to us, in 1861, a girl in her teens, and now, twelve years later, is universally recognized as "Operatic Queen." Friday was dedicated to a repetition, not the first by several, of Lucia di Lammermoor, the more interesting inasmuch as it was "for the benefit of Mdlle. Albani." No dramatic singer of recent times has managed in so short a space of time to consolidate her claim to be regarded as an artist worthy to take, and, in all probability, destined to take, a position equal to the highest. About Mdlle. Albani's performance of Lucia, her second character in 1872, and in some respects best suited to her talents and idiosyncracy, it is unnecessary to speak again. Enough that she has never sang or acted better than on the occasion under notice. She, too, like her more experienced comrade, Madame Patti, was received with all possible demonstrations of favour by an audience which filled the theatre in every part. That in this fair young Canadian Mr. Gye has obtained a new and valuable acquisition is generally allowed. Every amateur of the Italian Opera must watch with interest her future career.
